WASHINGTON COLUMN

BY PETER EDSON NEA Staff Correspondent

THE principles of the United Nations organization agreed to by representatives of the United States, Great Britain, Soviet Russia, and China meeting at Dumbarton Oaks are set forth in Chapter II of the proposed charter for a United Nations charter.

The first principle is that all peace-loving states should have sovereign equality—equality in the conduct of their own affairs and equality as members of an organization charged with keeping world peace.

This does not mean that every nation would assume equal responsibility in enforcing peace, nor an equal share of the cost in men or money, since some nations are obviously richer and bigger than others.

The specific obligations which each nation would be expected to assume are not spelled out in detail in the proposed charter. That is one of the phases of organization left to be worked out in special agreements, thus leaving the member states free from being cluttered up with too many tiny limitations which might restrict its activities.

In general, however, the United Nations charter would bind themselves to settle their disputes with other nations by peaceful means and to refrain from threat or use of force in settling international relations.

AN important point here is that the nation would be restrained from using force in its relations with other nations only—not in policing internal affairs. If a "home rule" movement should break out in India or Java, Siberia or even in one section of the United States for that matter, the governing power would be permitted and expected to cope with the uprising, as there is no intention to interfere with the internal police powers of a sovereign state.

To any action taken by the United Nations organization, however, the member nations would be expected to assume the obligation of giving their support. This would apply even to using their armed forces to put down threats to peace outside their own borders.

This of course might lead to complications, but nations in this proposed charter would be setting a new course of action for their future conduct, and they would be expected to behave differently than they have behaved in the past.

SGT. BILL PASSEN writes from Townsville, Australia, reviving the tragic story of Phar Lap, a story that will never die. "The Aussies still believe," reports Sergeant Passem, "that Americans poisoned the horse because we were afraid he might beat our best."

"This is ridiculous, of course, but at the time an Australian newspaper made the charge. The truth is that, after winning the Agua Caliente Handicap of 1932, Phar Lap died in northern California of arsenic of lead or some such poison spread on grass on which he was grazing.

PHAR LAP ran away from everything Down Under, was unquestionably a great horse. Although Phar Lap, a big fellow, beat nothing out of the ordinary in his one start in North America, in his time for the mile and a quarter with 129 pounds on his back, 2:02 4/5, was very good. Phar Lap was 6 years old at the time, and behind him were Itteville Boy, carrying 118, and Scimitar, in with 100. Revellie Boy won the American Derby two years before.

YOU GOTTA THINK QUICK

By Stanley Paley Copyright, 1944. NEA Service, Inc.

THE STORY: Kabateck has had such a good time with Leo and the nervous hitch-hiker he doesn't want to let go. He's so confident that he'll never again meet such a nice creature.

WE got into Hollywood at about 10. After stopping a couple of times to see the way, I pulled up in front of the Maybelle Apartments on Van Ness Avenue. The place had been recommended to Mickey by a friend. She'd written to the manager, and the kids were expected.

Maybe I was out of sorts from lack of sleep, but I couldn't show my enthusiasm. There was a depressing air about the long dark corridor and it was about as stuffy as Mrs. Wadley's boarding house.

I helped them bring up the suitcases, the rug, the rocks, and the other souvenirs, and the apartment began to look better. You even got a view of the hills if you leaned out the window.

"Well, kids," I said, "I'll be running along. You'd better clean up and take a nap. I'll do the same at the hotel, and some time this afternoon I'll be around to get you and then we'll see what Hollywood really looks like."

"Better make it this evening, Leo," said Mickey. "I don't see this is no vacation for us. Dan has to go out to the school and I'll register at the employment agencies. We can't afford to waste time."

"One day isn't going to make much difference," I said. "We'll love to see Leo. But please don't insist."

The girl behind the desk of her own. I'd already found that out. "Okay, Mickey. I'll be around at 7. I'll have dinner together."

"At the door of the apartment she took my hand. "You'll never know what it meant to us, meeting you like that."

"Forget it."

YOU GOTTA THINK QUICK

By Stanley Paley Copyright, 1944. NEA Service, Inc.

THE STORY: When Leo Kabateck arrives at the hotel in Hollywood, two telegrams await him. From Buenos Aires he orders him to return to New York at once. There is also a message to look up a Mrs. Perez, who turns out to be an agent of Boggio's.

I'D gone through enough things in life not to be scared by a big palooka trying to make a monkey out of me. But this conversation interspersed with Mr. Perez's toilet was beginning to get me down.

"Perez," I said, "will you tell me what it's all about?" He either didn't hear me or pretended not to. He was still using that shaving brush and whistling softly. It was the whistle of a guy who doesn't know how. There was no tune and it was profoundly irritating. I got up and walked over to the door.

That worked. He stuck his head out the bathroom. "What's the matter? Where you going?"

"I'll come back later, when you're less busy."

"Don't be so impatient. I'll be through in a jiffy. Here, read a book."

He grabbed a volume from the night table and came over to give it to me. "You're as nervous as a cat, Kabateck. Take it easy."

I didn't want to argue, so I sat down while he started shaving. I closed the book. It was a simple treatise on brain operations. What the hell Perez was going with it I couldn't figure out. I closed the book and looked around for some more palatable literature. There were a couple of volumes on the table beside me. The first was a monograph entitled "Pain and the Defense Mechanism." The second was a fat treatise on obstetrics. I was about to put them both down when I noticed that the author of the monograph was Nicholas Perez.

"Are you a doctor?" I asked.

"Who is it?" "Leo Kabateck. I've just arrived and I got your message." There was a short silence. Perez must have been groping his way out of a fog. "Oh, yes," he said. "Kabateck! Come on up."

THE shades were drawn and the lamp at the bedside was on. Outside the California sun was shining but in here you'd have thought it was New York on a winter morning. Perez had just got out of bed. His silk pajama top was open and the hair on his chest was the real thing. He was a large man, something over six feet, and with shoulders like a football player. I'd never seen so many contradictions in one person. The physique of a gorilla and the face of a Salvation Army officer. I winced when he gripped my hand, but when he began talking it was in a low, cultured voice.

"Sit down, Kabateck. What was the delay?" "What delay?" "Weren't you supposed to get here two or three days ago?"

"I wasn't supposed to get here at any specified time. I'm on a vacation. Or am I? What is all this?"

Perez, sitting on the edge of the bed, stretched and yawned. "Mind if I get dressed?"

He peeled off the pajama top and walked over to the bathroom. I heard him turn on the water. Then he began gurgling and spluttering as he washed. The man was either lousy or damn-minded. For a moment I thought he'd forgotten all about me, but then he came back, drying his ears with the corner of a towel.

"Have a cigar?" I took one from the silver box he presented.

"About your wanting to see me," I began. "I take it you're a friend of a friend of mine."

"I represent Virgil Boggio's interests out here."

The way he said it you'd have thought he was general sales manager for Standard Oil. "Then he went back into the bathroom and began lathering his face."

five minutes later. "It's all arranged."

"What is it?" "I've sent Mr. Boggio a telegram in your name telling him your plane arrives in New York tomorrow at 10:45 a. m."

"My plane?" "The one you're taking at Burbank this evening at 8."

"My blood began to boil. "You're taking a lot for granted, Perez."

"Come now, Kabateck," he said soothingly, "you weren't planning to stay?"

"I like to make my own decisions."

"Don't be so stubborn." He was talking to me like a petulant child. "And now we'd better see about your car."

THAT had been the last straw. He'd wanted me to drive directly to a dealer down the street to sell it. I'd argued some more, telling him I could store it and come back to get it some time later or have it shipped out. He'd pointed out that those expenses plus the price I'd get would buy a new car.

Then I remembered all those souvenirs. My share amounted to a couple of rugs, a 10-gallon hat, the Indian headdress and two or three rocks. It was too much to take on the plane so I decided to leave everything with the kids.

Perez said he'd drive over with me. That man stuck like a leech. On the way to the Maybelle Apartments I realized he was the last person I wanted. Mickey and I met and I wrenched my hands trying to figure a way out. I needn't have worried. When we got there the manager told me the Stevens had left about 20 minutes earlier. I dumped the stuff in the office with a note and went back to my bodyguard. Thereafter I didn't much care what happened. When the dealer made me a lousy offer for the car I took it without a fight. And when Perez offered to take me sightseeing in his car before going to the airport, I let him. When things start going wrong in a way you become apathetic.
