Hall today's bables. Science predicts those infants have abadd of them the longest, mest, reductive lifetimes ever known.

Thanks to new knowledge of care and feeding, bables of today me healthier, happier, easier-to-care-fer infants. Advances in the science of infant nutrition are an important factor in this picture. In possibly no other field have such dramptic strides been made as have occurred in the past 25 years from the time when infants received only milk until they were a years, id to today when bables of a few weeks are receiving a diet as varied as an adult's.

Meat, once unheard of in the infant diet, new is recognized as essential to growth in early months. A study in a leading unit only has shown that specially prepared meats fill growth needs of even premature bables. A research study just compiled at Chicago's St. Vincent's Hospital by members of the Loyela University departments of Pediatrics preved that babless fed Swift's strained meats were healthier infants, cried has and caught fewer colds than infants living under the same conditions but who were not sed meat. In reporting this study in the medical journal, Pediatrics, it was observed that the meat-fed bables had a 40 percent lower linear rate and that they becomed to have greater vitality and slept more coundly."
