NVIOUS people sneered when Percy Strathford Grey passed the civil service examinations

It was due to his being a cousin of the Duke of Eastminster. There was an upon the latter and was now leisurely lota of truth in the sneer, as there is in journeying along the China coast en most sneers. The distinguished relative had aided Percy by the confidential hint that the Chinese examination was the easiest of all and that the chief ex- port she had a triumphal welcome. aminer was deaf and egotistic. The student took advantage of the hint and, being ambitious and persevering, had no trouble with the department of red tape. Shortly after the announcement came his appointment as student interpreter to the Tientsin consulate.

Here he arrived in due season and bemandarin or official language. Percy engaged an old Chinese gentleman in slow progress which marks instruction under such auspices.

He accordingly had recourse to the method employed by student interpreters from time immemorial in the far east and bought a "living dictionary"-that is, he purchased from her grateful parents a Chinese wife. Ni Hu, the lady in question, was a girl of eighteen, well built and strong, as are. most of the women of Shangtung. Plain from a Chinese point of view, she wasattractive and even handsome to a European eye. Her family belonged to the poor middle class, so that she had had the advantage of highly educated surroundings, if not of a high education herself. She was bright, lively and affectionate. Percy hired a Chinese house and lived the life of a native scholar. His prog

the credit went to the consul, who seemed to, have blossomed out into a second youth. Then as the truth crept out it went in full measure to Grey. At the end of the five years several events occurred. Percy received a leave of absence for a year, with permission to visit England. With the leave came the notice that on account of his meritorious services he had been promoted to consul. At the same time came the visit of Miss Trevelyan. This young lady was tall, handsome and a presumptive heiress. She was connected with a dozen great families

In the examination which then occurred he received high praise from the judges, upon whose report he was pro moted from student interpreter to vice consul and was assigned to the city and district of Che Foo.

In the latter city he took a pretty house, installed his Chinese wife and lived the happy-go-lucky life of the far east. Five years passed uneventfully, Twice Ni-Hu presented him with a pretty babe which inherited his red blond hair and gray eyes and the mother's Mongolian cheek bones. As she was a devoted mother and they admirable infants, their presence did not disturb him in the least. On the contrary, he grew quite fond of them. They were his children by Chinese law, just her a superb stepping stone in his as Ni Hu was his wife, but by English law neither they nor she bore any relation to him except a meretricious one. Percy did his best to advance himself at Che Foo. His' superior, the consul, had grown gray in the service and did just as little work as possible. He was therefore delighted to have the vice. consul perform the duties of the office. By degrees the younger man exercised more and more of the consular functions until he was practically consul in all but name. The reports and dispatches were such models as to attract the attention and win the praise of the

Her eyebrows and lashes and much of her front hair were gone, and the malady had affected her voice, which was harsh and deep. But beneath her unprepossessing exterior the woman displayed intelligence, fidelity and skill. The baby took to her, and as the mother grew weak the nurse and child became inseparable. Grey paid little attention to either. What thought he did not give to his office was be-

The News has more than once commented on the fact that very many farmers fail to avail themselves fully of the many sources of information in regard to their calling that are now offered. During the last twenty years there has been a wonderful development of the sciences that underlie the art of farming, especially in the application of their principles to practice. Prior to the other end of that period there were but few books adapted to the ordinary farmer's use. They were either a few old books that were almost totally lacking in science, or a still smaller number that were filled with scientific discussions. but lacking in adaptation to the concrete. There was a "missing link," a want of the practi cal that prevented them from fulfilling the purpose for which they were written. The "missing link" was a want of practical acquaintance, on the part of the authors, with the farm and with the actual condition and needs of the farmer. This gap has been filled within the last few years by men who have been especially educated at agricultural colleges, well trained to habits of close observation experimentation, both in laborapractice and the union is now one and inseparable, there be

A hail storm on Friday even ing of last week did considerable damage to growing crops and gardens at this place and a scope of country covering some 6 or 8 miles south of town. For age crops will not suffer ma terially as a result of the hail but will be considerably retarded in growth as a consequence. The cotton that was in this area will be almost a total loss, it is feared. However, with the exception of several acres put in by Judge Lair, there is not sufficient acreage in the affected district to "corner" Randall county's cotton crop.
