Lights of New York
By L. L. STEVENSON

The cold cut into the being of Jerry the Grifter like keen little knives. There wasn't much to stop it—just a ragged overcoat he had salvaged from a rubbish can in front of a tenement, an overcoat so utterly worthless it hadn't interested even the lowliest second-hand man. Beneath that overcoat was a sweater which was heavy but had many holes. Instead of trousers, he wore overalls. They were whole but they were cotton. He had no underwear. The last time he had gone to the "munny" for a night's lodging, his underwear had given up while being sterilized. He had sold the suit the city had supplied him and with the proceeds bought a bottle of smoke. The smoke had brought forgetfulness for awhile. That had seemed a good investment at the time. But shambling along the Bowery, his lips blue and his teeth chattering, he wished he had retained the underwear. It would keep him warm—or he could sell it and buy more smoke.

He had to keep moving. If he stopped, those little knives would reach his heart. He didn't know why but he didn't want them to do that. True, there would be a much longer forgetfulness than the strongest smoke could bring. There wouldn't be any more sleeping in flops when panhandling was good or on park benches and gratings when it wasn't. There wouldn't be any more cops either. He didn't care for cops. They caused him too much trouble. That very morning one had shown up just as he was doing the whinge for a sap who looked good for a dime or maybe two bits. He had to beat it. To be arrested meant the island. They knew Jerry the Grifter over on the island and would make it tough for him. Still he didn't want to die.

At the next corner he turned. He didn't notice what street he was on—it didn't make any difference because he wasn't going anywhere. Just keep moving so he wouldn't freeze to death. His progress was slow. He couldn't remember when he had eaten last. Maybe the night before he had had a dish of stew. He wished he hadn't thought about stew. It reminded him how hungry he was. Delicatessen windows came into his notice. In them were big brown turkeys, roast ducks with their legs in the air, hams cut in the middle, huge roasts of beef and mites and miles of sausages. The keenness of his hunger dulled even the thrusts of those little cold knives.

If he didn't eat soon, he told himself, he'd drop on the sidewalk. That would be bad. They'd gather him up and take him to Bellevue. Then they'd send him to the works. He might get six months. In six months it would be summer. Summer! Trains running out into the sticks with meals for the asking and hay for flops! The sidewalk took a curious undulating motion. Dizziness made him stop. Beside him was a push cart filled with row after row of big pretzels—and the back of the owner was turned. The hand of Jerry the Grifter shot out.

Not a half block away, a grip on his arm stopped his crazy, lurching burst of speed. A cop had him, a big, solid, red-faced cop. But he wrenched himself free long enough to cram the last of those big pretzels into his mouth. The cop looked at him, then muttered something about not having the heart to pinch a starving man for hooking a bit of grub. Still chewing the pretzel, Jerry the Grifter started away. As he did so, something was thrust into his hand. Cops were human after all. He was the possessor of a half dollar.

At the corner, Jerry the Grifter stopped. "I took four," he told the push cart owner.

"Be honest you are, I charge you wholesale," replied the vendor, returning 45 cents.

With the coins jingling in the pocket of his overalls, Jerry the Grifter headed for the Bowery. Peace was his. He no longer felt those little sharp knives. Hunger had ceased to gnaw him. The problem of bed and board was solved for the next 48 hours.

THE SURRENDER OF SANTA ANNA AT SAN JACINTO ON APRIL 22, 1836

Had General Sam Houston been equipped with a battery of Electric Sewing Machines following the Battle of San Jacinto, the job of repairing the tattered uniforms of his brave band of soldiers would have been a trifle as compared to the slow hand method which prevailed in 1836.

Today electricity is successfully used for almost any purpose on the battlefield or in the home or office.
