Particularly is it likely to liven the discussions locally. When the candidates are in some far state and one reads about it in the newspaper it has one shade. When it comes right up to the front door of where you live it takes another hue.

As For Senator Johnson, when he gets to Texas it seems he has more of a job explaining to the home foks why he is not at the head of the ticket than he does of expounding the politics which he and his partner are espousing. Explanations are always lame things. What most Texans had in mind was to win or lose the nomination for president with Johnson. Failing that they anticipated being out of the picture. Any candidate who is put in the position of explaining to the home folks somehow doesn't arouse a lot of enthusiasm.

As To Mr. Kennedy he needs to turn on the personality whether tired or not and he needs, most of all, to convince protestant. Democrats that they can trust a Catholic to be president of the United States and not a minion of the papacy. Whether it is right to do so, whether it is a cruel attitude to take toward a man whose background of service to his country in time of peril is outstanding, the fact remains that enough protestants have misgivings to make the difference between carrying Texas and not carrying it. Mr. Kennedy knew he had this kind of a pattern cut out for himself. That is the sole job he has to do to carry this state.
