Then, lastly, there were the house decorations to be attended to. There were willing hands in the home which helped hang wreaths, trim the tree and put up the little sprigs of holly and mistletoe. Melodies not familiar to the younger generation filled the house. The humming and quiet whistling told of expected joys not now far in the offing.

There was shopping to be done and many preparations for the food which would be necessary. Busy days, but what happy ones. At noon the festivities took on proportion. One would never have guessed that the folks ranged anywhere from seventy to ninety-five, as they trooped in to Christmas dinner. The table was heavily laden with all the Christmas delicacies, especially good for people of their age. They also had another little surprise. They had fifteen radiantly happy gue who were introduced to them. It was indeed hard to judge which was enjoying the dinner the most, the young or the old. Suffice it to say, the young folks encored it the most.

Before the group left the table Mrs. Barber made a little announcement. "Our guests have come out today not only to help us enjoy our Christmas dinner, but to help us to have a delightful afternoon. They have come prepared to present a short Christmas play and to furnish us a little musical entertainment."

STORY FROM THE START

Dr. Ronald McAlleter, famous in his apecial work, - applied psychology - employs his leisure time in the elucidation of crime mysteries. As the narrative opens he is interested in the murder, in the small town of Oak Ridge, of recluse. Henry Morgan. With young friend, who tells the story, and Ashton, assistant dis-trict attorney, who is working on the case, he outlines the trag-

CHAPTER II

No one could deny my old chief a sense of humor, but his possession of it did not always prevent him from taking literally a remark intended to be jocular. He walted in perfect silence until Ashton laid down his fish fork and took his first sip of coffee. Then he pounced upon him like a cat.

"So you want my help, do you? Well, I'm glad of that. I'm glad that at last there's a district attorney's office in this country advanced enough to use applied psychology in the detection of crime. I'm at your service absolutely. Phelps, here, and I will do all we can for you. But you must tell us all about the case first."

Ashton laughed. "I'm sorry to disappoint you, but the fact is that when I spoke of wanting your help, I was not thinking of you as a psychologist, but as a New Zealander."

Doctor McAlister frowned. "What has my being a New Zealander to do with it?"

"Why," said Ashton, "we found some bundles of old newspapers and various other odds-and-ends which seemed to point to Morgan having lived at one time in Wellington, and knowing that you had spent all the early years of your life in those parts, It occurred to me that you might have some connection there which would assist us in tracing him,"

"Of course," growled the doctor, "I'll do anything I can for you."

Partly to appease him and partly because the subject was running strongly in his own mind, Ashton talked about little else than the Oak Ridge mystery during all the while we sat at dinner.

"The papers will make a great sensation tomorrow morning," he said, "of the testimony at the inquest of a young man named Harvey. I wish we might have got hold of him before that fool of a coroner did. His testimony sounded like a choice selection of pages from the 'Old Sleuth,' and I am inclined to think that it has just about as much relation to fact. I left Mallory-he's one of the detectives in our office-out in Oak Ridge to keep an eye on him. He's to bring him down to the office in the morning. Until I have questioned hm pretty thoroughly, I sha'n't know whether to believe a word of his tale, or not. Mallory seems half inclined to think that the boy has some active connection with the crime, but that I disbelieve ut-

"Tell us about him," said the doc-

"Why, he's a young fellow well known there in town. His parents are eminently plous and respectable, but Willie enjoys the reputation of being a little fast. He's one of these imitation college boys, very well pleased with himself and quite a lady-killer, I Judge, from the snickers that went round the room when he testified that he had gone out to call on a young lady and had not found her at home.

"I am telling you all that because It throws something of a light on his testimony. He swore that as he passed the house about nine o'clock, he noticed a light in the upper windows. The shades were down, he said, and in silhouette on one of them he could see old Morgan leaning back in a chair in an unnatural attitude, and have you come. Reinhardt won't obwith something queer-looking around his throat. That would be interesting enough, and may be true, but hear what he piles onto it. He says he saw the shadow of another figure on the shade, the figure of a woman, who was leaning over Morgan and making strange gestures in the air."

"Well," said the doctor, "may not that be true, too?" "He might have made us think so if te had stopped there," said Ashton, but his subsequent testimony made t perfectly clear that he was lying. He told the coroner that after watching that lighted window shade for a moments, be had walked away gone straight home, and that was all he knew about it. Then the coroner stioned him more closely as to the nce of the woman. He deod her very fully. He said she ne young, protty, dark, and that she wor a groon cleak with a high turned ordiar; and yet, mind you, he had not testified that he had only seen The suggestion that he might have lived in New Zealand set the doctor early days spent in that part of the world.

"That was a great country for boy to spend his childhood in," he said presently, "at least in the days when I was a youngster. That was during the gold rush, you know. They were finding it everywhere. And a wild lot of men they were. And if we had gold hunters ashore, we had pirates, and famous ones, too, afloat. Why, I myself saw Bully Franklin once."

"Was he a pirate?" Ashton inquired politely, but with no great interest. "Was he a pirate! Well, what does fame amount to? He was a pirate that a British cruiser once spent a whole year looking for, tramping up and down the Pacific on the wildest goose chase that ever a cruiser led." I was rather glad to get the doctor to talking of something besides the murder, so I pushed along on this topic. "I suppose he got what was coming to him, at last." I remarked. "That thick-witted deputy coroner

"Well, I don't know; not poetle jusseemed to find nothing extraordinary tice, certainly. Nothing like what his in this description, and did not ask crimes called for. And not one his men was interested in, and it's said of his precious jurors inquired about the fellow bashed his head with a it, either. So his testimony went entiller one night as he was coming tirely unchallenged. Of course I could aboard, up over the side. His crew have spoken up, but I was only too went all to pieces after that. The authorities got hold of most of them and row morning, when I shall have the hanged them in short order."

"How did you happen to see him?" I asked. "I should think a pirate would be rather a difficult man to come to close quarters with."

"Let's see," he answered reflectively. "It was when we were living at Hokitiki. My father was manager of a branch of the Union bank there. Franklin put into the harbor and came ashore. I was only a lad then, and a good deal disappointed that he hadn't a long black mustache and a pair of pistols in his belt. He probably had the pistols somewhere, but they didn't show, and he was mild looking

Then he turned suddenly to Ashton. "How old a man did you say this Morgan was?"

"A man apparently about sixty." "Well, if he was out in that part of bluntly. "The profile he saw in sil- the world when I was, he was old enough to have had a rather lively with some woman with black hair, and | time."

"I don't know whether it is a case that will interest you, or not," he said, "but it's rather curious. She was picked up for drunk, half frozen, out of the gutter by a patrolman. He rang up the wagon and they took her to the police station, but the desk sergeant disagreed with the diagnosis, and sent her here. Gilbert was on been made. Before he could think of duty when they brought her in, about two o'clock this morning, and he thought it was concussion of the brain. For myself, I don't believe it. I'd say, to look at her, that she's normally asleep, except that we can't wake her. She's queer looking; pretty, in a sort of outlandish way. When I last looked at her she was mumbling the queerest gibberish you ever heard. I've got a nodding acquaintance with most of the he read, if he read at all, or what he languages that come in here, but I never heard anything that sounded at all like this."

Lynn Haven, Fla., I became interested in your article on 'Musical Earthworms,' and noted that some scientists were giving their attention to a solution of the mystery. It reminds me of a peculiar fact that is often onticed in Florida-in the St. Andrews bay district, at least. When fishermen want fishworms for bait they go out and fiddle for them. It is accomplished in this way: A thin board is driven well into the ground to leave a foot or eighteen inches above the ground. Another board or stick is drawn back and forth across the upright board, producing a shuddering or vibration of the upright board. After a few seconds of this, large worms begin to crawl out of the earth for twenty-five or thirty feet around the center upright, and the fisherman has only to pick them up. I have seen eighty to one hundred picked up from a single effort. My husband has tried the same method in North Caro lina and in Michigan, but without success, while I have seen him succeed every time he has tried in Lynn Haven."-Mrs. W. B. Harrell, in a letter to the Literary Digest.

Gasoline Substitute

An alcohol mixture said to be capable of replacing gasoline in engines of automobiles, and possibly of airplanes, has been developed by the Warsaw Polytechnic institute and is attracting much attention in Poland. It is said that required adjustments in the engine for use of the mixture are slight, and in many ways the new liquid is superior to gasoline. Noalcohol fit for beverage purposes can be separated from the mixture, even by fractional distillation. As the price of each of the ingredients, except ether and benzol, is less than that of gasoline, the mixture could be made cheaper than gasoline, it is claimed by the institute.
