Economic Highlights

Within the very near future this country will start serious work on preparing the draft of a military alliance with a group of foreign nations. That would have happened before, had this not been an election year. As it was, the State Department and the other agencies involved thought it best to postpone it until after the election, in order to keep it above and beyond partisan political considerations.

It is a remrkable thing that such a proposal should be seriously made in a country which until recently, had religiously followed Washington's admonition against entangling foreign alliances. It is a still more remarkeable thing that some kind of a military alliance has every chance of being approved that, indeed, the odds are overwhelmingly in its favor. There is no better illustration of the
