WOODWORK

BY DALTON

THE FEDERAL government has ordered all swordfish off the market, because the FDA found it had mercury in it, and too much might make you sick or dead, or something.

Well, you know, our first reaction to this startling bit of news was a ho-hum, so-what sort of thing. Now when they order ketchup (catsup?) off the market, or cornbread, or crow, or something we eat frequently, they will get my attention. But we just couldn't get too excited about swordfish.

A woman I know noticed I was reading the story about the swordfish order and she asked me if my family ever ate any swordfish.

"Sure," I replied. "Probably about three times a week. It lays on the platter about this long (gesturing a three-foot measurement) ... we usually break off the snout and use it to saw up the rest of the fish..."

I don't think she heard the last part, because she already had left the room.

Of course I was kidding. I never saw any swordfish in my life, not even at a seafood restaurant, although it probably has been on some of the menus. I've even seen candy-covered ants and chunks of octopus meat in some places, but never any swordfish. So I figured she had to be kidding when she asked me if we ever ate any of the stuff. She admitted she'd never seen or tasted any, either.

Another fellow in my office messed up my conclusion that nobody in this area ever actually ate swordfish, or would miss it. He made the comment, without even knowing we had been discussing the matter, that "my wife and I are very upset over this deal on swordfish."

At first I thought he was putting me on, but he said they ate it occasionally at Lubbock, and liked it very much.

Upon reflection, I decided this figures, though. The guy who likes to eat swordfish is the same one who is happy when the sand is blowing and sad when it rains (he likes the sandstorms because they uncover spear points, arrowheads and old Indians), and who won't eat anything with fruit in it.

I'm tempted to tell you what his religion is, too, but that would get me in a heck of a lot of trouble.

Minyard pointed out that the new increases are authorized on a temporary basis until the newly created Postal Rate Commission can make recommendations and set the department on a self-supporting schedule.

Airmail letters will increase to 11 cents and post cards will be six cents. All other mail will be effected by the temporary rates. A complete list of the temporary rates is printed elsewhere in this paper.
