STORY FROM THE START

In the usually quiet home of Rev. Mr. Tolliver of Red Thrush, Iowa, his motherless daughters. Helen, Miriam and Mien-"Gin-ger Ella"—are busy "grooming" their sister Marjory for participation in the "beauty pageant" that evening. With Eddy Jackson, prosperous young farmer, her escort, Marjory leaves for the anticipated triumph.

While Ginger comptained, however. she obligingly did her share of the straightening, and the dusting, and the rearranging.

"Nice sensible girls like ours, no trills, no nonsense, no put-on about them. Work bard. Good natured Easy to live with. But let a man darken the horizon-disgusting, simply disgusting. Do you understand it. father?"

"Well, perhaps-at least, I am used to it," he evaded acrollly.

Helen, returning, laughed good naturedly. "Now, now, little one don't be jealous," she said.

"Jealous-jealous! Me. jealous? Jealous of a-a male school teacher?" Helen frowned. "Father I wish you wouldn't let her say 'male school teacher in that insulting manner. A professor of mathematics with two de grees is not the same as a male school teacher. And besides, as you know very well, he isn't going to teach for ever. He is going to write textbooks."

"Textbooks! But they've already got textbooks. Don't tell me they're going to discover more mathematics to make us tearn."

"Ginger, don't talk so loud, for goodness sake. He'll be here in a minute Sh! Here be is." "Disgusting - simply disgusting."

Ginger buried herself once more in the despised paper. Horace Langley came in, greeted Helen with a perfunctory, before-thefamily kiss, and shook hands with Mr.

"What's the matter with Ginger?" Ginger looked up. "Oh, bello-are you here? I was just interested inuh," she stole a look at the paper. "what Lloyd George said to the Elks

-1 mean, to Coolidge." She nudged "Ellen, suppose we run down and have a cream cone? I feel quite fatigued with the strain of living up the Marjory's beauty. Won't you come along, Miriam? Helen, why don't you and Horace come, too?" "Oh, I don't thirk so, father. Not this time, thanks. You go. And do keep an eye on Ginger. She's so apt to break out unexpectedly, you know." But Ginger, disdaining answer, with great hauteur led the way down the flagstone path that curled through the green grass.

CHAPTER II

It was a pleasant house, the old brown Methodist parsonage at Red Thrush, Iowa, While it was old in point of years, it was not called the old parsonage for its age, but because a new one was in projection.

It is true that it boasted all modern improvements, but they were improvements so obviously added to cater to a progressive generation that they fifted but inharmoniously into its general contour. The bathroom had been painstakingly installed in a corner bedroom. Electricity had been wired in, at as little expense as possible. A furnace had been introduced into a cellar room, and at that time, to fa ellitate the piping, the partition be tween parlor and sitting room had been removed to make one large living room, in strict conformity with the style.

It was the living room which boasted the second charm of the old house. in the form of a circular staircase ris ing grandly from the back of the room. Perhaps, in the most technical phraseology, it was not altogether a circular staircase, but it curved grace fully upward, and gave the same effect. The girls toved it.

But where the old parsonage was merely of a drab pleasantness, the new one was to be a mouel of modern architecture. It was to have electric refrigeration-a parsonage! Only five houses in Red Thrush had electric refrigeration-the new parsonage would be the sixth. In the true sense of the "Discipline." the old parsonage was no parsonage at all. It was merely a house, owned by ember, and rented to the church for its pastoral use for ten dollars a The Methodist church had thrust its small spire above the sur rounding maples ween there were no more than a dozen houses in the township. a staunch liftle testimony to the judefatigable determination of early Methodism. pyright by Bobbs Merrill Co. W.N.U. SERVICE and was nothing at all in these, its worst ones. As anything but a church it would have been abandoned for practical purposes years ago. It was the growing realization-and it takes a church group many years to grow up to this realization-of the aboslute need for more ample accommodations that brought Mr. Tolliver to Red Thrush. The district super-Intendent had been asked to pick out a "hustler" to put the new church over on the congregation. Mr. Tolliver was known as a bustler, and so he came with his four daughters to the shabby brown parsonage in the maple grove beside the old brown church.

It was the nervous strain of overwork attendant upon tustling the new church into Red Thrush that finally resulted in a nervous reaction and physical wearing down which led at last to temporary blindness, a cloud over his eyes. a thick mist fogging his vision. Rest, the specialists in Chicago said he needed, good food, good air, a general building-up. The eyes would be all right, when he was all right. He must take it easy for a while. And so his eyes were carefully bandaged from even the faintest light, to insure complete relaxation and freedom from strain, but his entire system must gain strength in order to feed strength to the weakened members. His body must rest. His mind must rest. His intense and eager spirit must rest.

But before this catastrophe, the church was an assured fact. Within a few weeks, by the first of September at latest, it would be ready for its formal opening. The new parsonage existed in blue print. After all, a few months of blindness was a small price to pay for this achievement.

Freedom from worry, the doctors promised, complete rest and mental ease would soon restore his sight, and Mr. Tolliver, although greatly handlcapped in his work, did not worry as to the final outcome. True, upon his first visit to the doctors, some three months previous, they had thought a month's time would be amply sufficient for his recovery, and at the end of the month the mist was still dark upon him. Another month, and still the mist. He should have returned some days ago for a third examina tion and treatment, but the financial situation in the parsonage was such as to render this impossible. He told himself there was no burry, he would go soon. For what with the travel. and botel expenses, and medical treat ments, the burden of his misfortune was more financial than physical.

But all this was only for a short time. When the new church was a fact accomplished, he felt it would be easier for his ardent spirit to find the rest that would mean restoration for his eyes. He felt no sort of resentment for his affliction. He got on very well. The girls were good, they helped him greatly. The members were patient, full of sympathy, be cause they loved him. He knew his Bible from cover to cover, and his every thought was centered upon his work so that his sermons did not deteriorate. Just a little rest, freedom from killing worry. If only there were more money!

If the girls felt anxlety on his account, bravely they gave no sign. A. hundred dollars a month is not a great deal of money on which to support a family and maintain three daughters in school. And Mr. Tolliver had never relinquished h's old custom of tithing-a tenth of his mite for the Lord. If sometimes the girls felt that ten dollars a month could better be spared from the church than from the parsonage, that the Lord in His affluence might better be deprived than the pastor in his poverty, they did not complain. Ellen thought about it. of course, for she was turbulent, given to turbulent thoughts. It was her birth which had cost the home its mother. Perhaps it was sorry knowledge of what she had cost the family that stirred her to a great eagerness to do something for them, that determined her to carry life before her with a high and triumphant hand. Perhaps it was only her youth, for she was not yet seventeen. It was for this turbulence of hers that she was known as Ginger Ella.

Helen, who was twenty-three years up beetles. old, after two years of training at the normal school, had served for two years as a teacher in a neighboring town. Her small check coming into the parsonage every month had meant something almost akin to richness. until the unaccustomed expense of medical treatments had made such voracious demands upon them. Now the twins also were ready to go into the normal school for training in the fall. Ginger felt that it was a real extravagance on the part of the family to assume the expense of educating Marjory to teach school. That money might better be saved. Marjory was beautiful. The obvious end of beauty is marriage to great fortune. From her earliest childhood, in her queer, small heart, Ginger Ella had sacredly dedicated her beautiful sister to that high estate. She would enrich the family by marriage. In her inexperienced youth, Ginger general groups-regular men, roman... figures and base pretenders. Regular men were like ber father, settled urbane, and immune to sex. Like Eddy Jackson. Ginger called him a regular. Eddy Jackson had been one of their first friends when the Tollivers came to Red Thrush. He was a farmer. Not hat Ginger called what Eddy Jackson did farming. The neighbors did not call it that, either. Ginger Ella called it playing. They called it kid-gloving. Eddy Jackson was an agriculturist, an experimentalist. He was of the new school, one of those who studies the land as a mechanic studies his tools. The neighbors gardener stop cutlaughed at what they called his high dinkuses-but the fact that he made, in spot cash, every year, nearly twice as much money as they did from the same amount of land, gave him a certain authority among them. They where the tools said he was lucky, but they went to him for advice.

There was a long low building on his farm which Ginger called the sacred shed. Eddy Jackson called it the lab. And there, with microscopes and plates and curious tubes and queer liquids and funny little boxes and bottles and cans of sand and soil, Eddy Jackson did strange things. with soil, with seeds and sprouts.

Often, during the summer, young men, students from the state universities, came and stayed at the farmwhich Eddy called Pay Dirt-and hobnobbed about with him fraternally. But when Eddy told them to do anything, they obeyed as if they were servants. And so they were. But not the servants of Eddy Jacksonservants of the soil, of the state, the great farming state of lowa. So Eddy Jackson, for all his youth and his sometimes flippant way of dealing with serious subjects, fitted into Ginger's classification as regular -just like her father. He never waxed sentimental. He never succumbed to what she bitterly termed "pawing." He went about with Helen until Professor Langley attained the heights of monopoly in her time as well as her affection, and then he obligingly transferred his attentions to the twins, taking them interchangeably according to the occasion, or both together, and sometimes, although she always protested. Ginger herself.

polite about it. But all the same neither of them had been able to keep awake and so they were napping away, having lovely dreams of the marvelous things their children were going to do when they became big and grown The people who lived in the house nearby had told the gardener to be sure to cut all the long grass around the hedge. They thought it looked so untidy

Of course, they did not know that the Beetles were using that spot for their parlor. At the very time they were giving those directions, Mrs. Black Beetle and Mrs. Brown Beetle were there, sound asleep. But old Ramsay, the dog, was lying on the porch where the grown-ups were sitting. And he heard them tell the gardener about the long grass near the hedge He was dozing and when he heard what the grown-ups were talking about, up went his ears and he listened very hard. Pretty soon Ramsay saw the gardener go out with his lawn-mower and start cutting the grass on the lawn, as divided all men proadly into three he said he would need a scythe for the long grass near the hedge. Ramsay thought and thought of what he could do. He knew that Mrs. Black Beetle was calling on Mrs. Brown Beetle, as he had been taking a nap near the hedge when Mrs. Black Beetle arrived.

He knew, too, that they had both gone to sleep, for he had been running along near the hedge chasing an old tennis ball he had found. And he had to jump right over Mrs Black Beetle and Mrs. Brown Beetle set up a long, shrill wall. Mrs. Black Beetle and Mrs. Brown Beetle woke up with a start-and the gardener went over to Ramsay to see what the trouble was. Then the beetles got out of the way and back by the roots of the tree they crawled-saved by old Ramsay, the

To Play Indoors

In this game all the players sit in a circle.

One commences the game by pointing to another player and calling out two letters of the alphabet. Suppose these are O and Y. The player spoken to must instantly run through the alphabet leaving out these two letters.

When he has done this he points to another player, meanwhile calling out two letters. This player calls out the alphabet, leaving out those two letters. So the game goes on, anyone making a mistake standing out. The player who is left at the end wins the game.

.......... Symptom Hunting

IT IS indeed surprising how many people under a misguided idea of enjoyment develop and maintain a fear complex in relation to their wellbeing. For instance, a muscle pain on the left side of the chest convincingly suggests a fatal heart condition. a sore on any portion of the body is conclusive evidence of cancer, a pain in the neck is the first indication of chronic neuritis, a slight stitch in the lower right side is undeniable proof of appendicitis, a backache means kidney trouble and a cough of more than two days' standing is an established case of tuberculosis!

While it must be admitted that it Is always sensible to have a proper regard for the unusual manifestation, even though it be but a slight one, it is quite another matter to be forever and anon interpreting this and that little pain as an immediate indication of the necessity of a surgeon's knife or as the first step in the journey to the grave.

The super-egoist, who thus is constantly and for the time being, pleas antly in a mental furore, fails to real ize that this grand and glorious world has sufficient real trouble in it without borrowing Imaginary ones.

Moreover, in addition to being a downright nulsance to himself and others, a person habitually thinking in terms of personal calamity is likely to suffer from an unhealthy mental backfire.

There are, and will continue to be. many millions of people in the United States who will never become the victims of any of the major ills to which humanity sometimes is heir-a fact which the alarmists do not appear to appreciate.

For all practical purposes, barring acute conditions, the annual physical examination can usually be relied upon to guard one against the insidious inroads of the major maladies.

Consequently, if you are a symptom hunter drop it from your sport list and go in for something worth while. Symptom hunting most decidedly is a poor game.

Walk, but Watch Out

"HE other day a man was attempting to figure his bank balance while crossing the street. His family is now figuring how much they will owe the undertaker.

The point to this sad tale is this: that when one is crossing a street or highway the main business is to achieve the other side safely. Romancing, calculating or plain absentmindedness has no business being mixed up with the procedure.

Thousands of men and women who should have known better get seriously injured, and some times fatally so. simply because they falled to realize that the automobile will always have the best of the argument in case of a collision with a pedestrian.

Whether one does or does not choose to leave this world by way of an automobile knockout, in nine cases out of ten can be decided by the individual himself. Certainly, health of ficials cannot do much for him along this line.

True, there may be worse and more painful ways of bidding adieu to life. But that is a slight solace to him who really hasn't any actual desire to leave sooner than is absolutely required.

The New John Deere Combine You Should Know About

It's ready for you-the new John Deere No. 5 Combine. All that a good combine should be and several steps ahead of any similar machine yet produced. In the No. 5 you get John Deere dependability in full measure. This light-weight combine will stay on the job when time means money and do good work

You get balanced draft-combine's wide tread main wheels straddle the tractors wheel tracks. Wheels are high and wide. These features, along with the light weight of the No. 5, means lighter draft. Three-wheelin-line construction insures flexibility for good work on uneven ground. Grain platform is hinged to the combine frame.

You will like the simplicity of design and the easy operation of the John Deere No. 5, and the way it saves the grain and delivers it to the tank.

Motor has plenty of reserve power to maintain correct operating speed in heavy grain. High grade bearing equipment and grease gun oiling are other features

Here is a combine that is built right and will s right, which is the kind of machine that is most e omical in the long run.

Radio Broadcasting

Now in its seventh year, has proven itself one of the most rapidly growing institutions the world has ever known. With now over 600 stations in operation and with $25,000,000 invested in equipment, it is assuming such prodigious proportions that it bids fair in the near future to command more wealth than all other enterprises combined. Demand has made it great. In like manner MAGNOLIA PETROLEUM COMPANY'S products, starting from a small beginning, have assumed AN ENORMOUS VOLUME.

Don't just ask for "Motor Oil"

"Take-a-chance" oil in the engine sends many a good car to the scrap heap before its time has come. That's why it is so important to use a full-bodied motor oil - a highly refined oil-like TEXACO, the clean, clear, golden motor oil.
