OLD STATE DEBTS

There is renewed agitation in England for debts said to be due English bond holders from eight of our southern states. Those debts amounted originally to $75,000,000 and are now estimated, with interest to date, at over a quarter of a billion. They are said to represent money lent not to finance the Civil War, but money borrowed under the states' guarantee for railroads, banks and other enterprises after the war. They were repudiated when the ventures failed. Representatives of the British government, when asked to bring the matter to the notice of the United States government, refused on the ground that it would not be courteous. So officially nothing will be done about it. Privately, however, the question is destined to be brought up over and over, as long as the British are repaying their war and post-war indebtedness to the United States. It may be that the states concerned will find it good policy, sooner or later, to disregard technicalities and assume these old obligations in some degree. They might adopt the principle on which our government is now collecting its foreign loans-that of paying "according to their ability," over a long period.

WANTED: LOG CABIN

The Ohio State Museum, at Columbus, wants a og cabin for a permanent exhibit, and is now trying to find one somewhere around the state. The idea is to place such a pioneer building in one of its big display halls, complete with its old-fashioned walls, clapboard roof, fireplace, chimney and everything, so that the new generation may see for itself just how its ancestors lived in the wilderness. States less remote from the log-cabin age may find amusement in this plan. But they needn't. Better grab and preserve a good specimen while it's possible. Log vabins are artistic, as well as antique, and if nature is allowed to take her course they may soon be extinct. Prairie states likewise would do well to preserve good specimens of sod houses. Gazing at a log cabin exhibit, by the way, none of our flat-dwellers need feel so blamed superior.
