Fanatical Extremists

Just before the head of the British oil mission, Richard Stokes, returned to London, he ventured the opinion that the Iranians really did want a settlement. There is reason to believe Stokes was right, even though the British-Iranian talks collapsed in hopeless failure because Iran's negotiators refused to budge.

How can this be?

It can happen because the real government of Iran today is not Premier Mossadegh and his cabinet. It is a group of fanatical extremists whose minds and hearts are consumed by nationalist frenzy. Although these men enjoy none of the formalities of power, they nevertheless wield it.

The Mossadegh government is totally at the mercy of the extremists. Mossadegh and his moderate colleagues live in mortal peril of assassination if they make the alightest concession to Britain. Stokes had this in mind when he said the Iranians would like to settle the dispute. They would-but they cannot.

In consequence of their entrapment by fanatics, Iran's leaders negotiated for 18 days like Communists trembling in fear of Moscow. They yielded nothing. Their sole concession was a willingness to continue talking-about their own terms.

By re-asserting this willingness at the very end, they tried to place on the British the onus for the collapse of few of the problems that we in the discussions. But the blame is Iran's, thanks to the irrespon- Air Force are thinking about at sible coterie of extremists.
