We Need An Abe Lincoln

A few years ago a poll was taken among 55 leading American historians, asking them to rank all U.S. Presidents in ability and achievement.

In the final tabulation, six were classed as "great" and four as "near great." Abraham Lincoln's name led all the rest, even George Washington's.

It is not hard to understand why. He met the greatest crisis a young and growing nation could ever face: civil

A nation beaten by an outside fee may recover and rise to new strength. A country torn in two may never again command a vital place on the world stage.

For this achievement, Lincoln has the unqualified admiration of the professionals. He brought the United States through its hour of trial, and he did it with the consummate mastery of the statesman who was not above being a politician.

But Lincoln was more than the preserver of unity, more than the courageous helmsman piloting America through violent winds.

He was a man of compassion, of deeply human instincts. Though he wielded unparalleled power in war times, he did not dictate. He led.

He had the sympathy and support of ordinary folk because he was sympathetic to them and understood their problems and wants.

Thus Lincoln's greatness has a double foundation: He was a genius at statecraft, and he was a great leader of men in the fullest and most human sense.

People like to say that America has been lucky, that now national commander, might be thy, the senator from Wisconsin said we always seem to find the man to measure up when the times demand great leadership.

To be secure and to exert our strength for good amid Defense what he thought of the these complexities, we must spend more money than any political situation nation ever did in peacetime.

All these difficulties cry out for great leadership. But today we do not have it.

But for all his stubborn courage he appears unable to can't beat."
