SAN JACINTO IS GIVEN PRIZE IN SCHOOL CONTEST

To the residence district surrounding the San Jacinto School belongs the distinction of having the greatest improvement, both in the individual home surroundings and the neighborhood appearance, to the credit of the Junior Civic League of the San Jacinto School.

There were a number of districts in which there were no entries, consequently no prizes were awarded, according to Mrs. E. B. Smock, the president of the Civic League. The prizes were $5 in each district. The prize winners follow: District No. 1—Mrs. M. McDonald, 500 Burnett, first prize; R. I. McDonald, honorable mention.

Change in River Scenes. We spent Sunday on the river near Hampton Court. There seemed just as many gay little boats as of old but nearly every one had its soldier occupant, one or two English sailors in their little cove, every drooping willow bower, had its laughing floating tea party. And oh, such pretty dresses the girls wore. Nobody would have suspected that saddest lurked anywhere near a punt loaded lazily down stream with a girl in orchid mill on one side and a flapper in goose gown on the other.

"Dutch" Returns Here After Travelling Far From His Old Haunts

"Dutch," the young Austrian giant, who was paralyzed in an accident in the oil field here several years ago, has returned after an absence of more than a year. "Dutch" arrived on a side door Pullman sometime Friday night and early Saturday morning called on his patron "Gene" Leopold. "Dutch's" vocabulary is limited to a few words but by tracing on a map he told Mr. Leopold that he had traveled in New Mexico, Arizona, California and Old Mexico since he left Wichita Falls. He pointed to Sweetwater on the map and held up his ten digits and then placed them at right angles and peered through the bars to tell Mr. Leopold that he had spent ten days in jail at Sweetwater. He exclaimed "Kaiser" and pulled out some maps from his pocket, breaking into a laugh which became a paroxysm when Mr. Leopold exclaimed "spy." "Dutch" had been arrested and held as a German at Sweetwater.

At The Church of Christ, preaching at 11 and 7:30. Sunday school at 9:45. Come and be with us at every service. A welcome awaits you. E. C. CHRISTIAN, Minister.

THE DIARY OF A U-BOAT COMMANDER

5th April, 1917.
[Handwritten German text]

15th June, 1917.
[Handwritten German text]

[Copyright, 1917, by the New York Herald Company—All Rights Reserved.]

THE most remarkable, the most fascinating document to come out of the war has been obtained for publication in the New York Herald and this newspaper—"The Diary of a U-Boat Commander." Love, romance, drama, tragedy are woven through the narrative in sequences that might have been the product of a Victor Hugo's brain. Never more surely was proved the old epigram that "truth is stranger than fiction."

How many more Prussian submarine commanders there are like Lieutenant Commander Hans von Tuebinger, placed in charge of the U-13 just after the war began, is hard to say. Few, certainly. None, probably.

His death—he committed suicide—was described in the press despatches several weeks ago. By accident Von Tuebinger had slain his sweetheart when he destroyed her father's schooner. The girl's brother was killed by one of the submarine's crew. During the summer the U-boat sank a Norwegian steamship in the North Sea and ten of the vessel's complement were killed in the explosion. The day following Von Tuebinger, cursing the Kaiser, Von Tirpitz and the war, jumped from the conning tower of his craft into the sea and was lost.

After the submarine returned to its base the crew gathered together the belongings of their commander, including the diary he valued so highly, and smuggled them to a close friend in one of the Scandinavian islands.

To-day we print the first instalment of this diary. Successive instalments will be published from week to week. The work was so large and covered such a wide range of observations that in editing it for publication only its more generally interesting portions have been used.

The Diary of a U-Boat Commander

[Copyright, 1917, by the New York Herald Company—All Rights Reserved.]

(Translated from the Original German by Irving R. Bacon.)

1914—5. March.
 NOT the least of the pleasures since my arrival at Stockholm has been the meeting with Sven Larsen, whom I knew in the gymnasium, quite by accident, while sipping coffee at the Opera Kaffelaren. He took me to his home and I found his father, Lars Larsen, and mother and sister—I believe her name is Minna—most charming people. The father is an old sea dog, but full of good natured raillery. The daughter is very good looking, reminding me of a Graefchen in some "Faust" production that I have seen.
 Sven has studied a great deal since we left school and speaks on all subjects with an air of authority. Our conversation was of beauty, inspired, no doubt, by the good looks of his sister. She left the room soon after this subject was broached. Her modesty made her forbear taking part in a discussion of which she was so eminent a living exposition and exemplar yet lacked theories about it.
 I maintained that beauty is a sort of national affair, varying in accordance with the standards of the various nations. Sven insisted that it was something deeper and more philosophical.
 "It is the outward expression of the perfect agreement of the parts with the entire organism, in relation to the purpose for which the organism is intended," he said tersely. Scarcely knowing whether I had understood him, I nevertheless ventured the query, "What is the criterion as to this concord of the parts to the whole and also as to the purpose for which the organism is intended?"
 "Have you ever seen a mole?" he asked.
 When I had answered affirmatively he said:—
 "Then you have noticed the big shovel-like paws. Well, they were made of the same material as the skin. They are the chief organ of a mole throughout its life. Its eyes are little better than rudimentary. It does not need eyes, digging as it does nearly all the time in darkness beneath the surface of the earth. Shovel-like paws and barely perceptible, slight eyes are features of beauty about a mole. They would disfigure an eagle, just as the wings of an eagle and its large, intelligent eyes would look hideous in a mole. What an awful monstrosity hands would be on a tree! Why? Because a tree does not require them to fulfil any of the purposes of its existence. Man needs them for a thousand different purposes. Hence their beauty. Adaptability of means to an end, Hans—that is the secret of beauty. You as an artist should know this!"

 I did not like to submit without a struggle. "But that theory falls utterly to explain the attraction which we feel toward one whom we regard beautiful more than toward one whom we turn away from as homely," I said.
 "You are mistaken," replied Sven. "Beauty in a woman is put there by nature for the very highest purpose—namely, to attract. And why attract? For the very purpose for which nature produces all of us—to perpetuate the various species and preserve them in their normal condition. That is why short women love tall men, fat women lean men, weak women strong men, and vice versa; each appearing beautiful to his or her opposite. If big women loved only big men, fat women only fat men, and so forth, the human race would be thrown out of balance. We would become bigger, fatter, more herculean or smaller, weaker, leaner than nature designed us to be. Hence, again, Hans, I say, adaptability to the end is the sum and substance of beauty."
 Sven's sister re-entered the room. I did not think the turn our discussion had taken would be understood or appreciated by her and so, telling Sven that I would try to chew, swallow and digest what he had told me, I asked his sister to play something for us on the piano.
 No coaxing was required. Merely saying that she would in return for her compliance look to an indignant criticism for whatever shortcomings I would detect, she at once sat down and played. After several popular airs she played, at my further request, a considerable portion of Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," which always has been my favorite. Somehow, whenever I listen to that wonderful world dream of sound I feel as if the whole universe was passing in review before my imagination. While nothing definite is "spoken," yet there is a something in the sounds that conjures up a world vision with all the different thrills, passions and emotions which fill the human heart. The girl played well. I was enraptured.
 1914—5 April.
 CAN greater happiness be found than mine? Minna loves me! She told me so to-day. For three weeks I had not been able to concentrate my thoughts sufficiently to enter anything in my diary. Dear little book! I stared at thy blank pages with too chaotic a mind to intrust any word to thy keeping. The uncertainty concerning Minna's feelings toward me drove me almost frantic. Odd that I should not have realized that she regarded me with greater warmth of feeling than I dared hope. She showed me so

Why are we not trained from childhood to speak out our minds frankly concerning all our feelings? I wonder how that would work out in the end. I would have been spared much unhappiness if I had been able to utter to Minna the words that kept sticking in my throat. But, on the other hand, would so much frankness not tend to disillusion the world concerning its most sacred 'deals'? Those who approach the altar with a bold and confident air, cannot derive the same degree of sublime sweetness from their devotion as they who approach it filled with a religious reverence and awe. Unless love is a religion it cannot but have an alloy of baseness. My affection for Minna has taught me this. My love for her is a religion.

1914—15 June.

BUSY all day and late into the night at the easel. Minna was here twice watching me dab for an hour each time. Dear child! She encouraged me, although I feel that there is something lacking—an indefinable nuance—the more or less of which differentiates the true artist from the dauber.
 Sven, too, was here and told me roundly that he considers me an ass for doubting my ability to paint. "Why, just see how natural that dog looks, barking at the cow," he said.
 "And that setting sun," added Minna.
 "Can paint do more?" asked Sven.
 But flattering though this praise was to my vanity, I felt in my own heart that all I had achieved was what any photographic camera, plus a little coloring, might have done. Art is not to copy, but to reproduce nature.

Fritz Launig, my brother art student from Munich, was here in the afternoon and was less lenient than Minna or Sven.
 "You've copied nature admirably, Hans," he said, "but you have merely shown an individual dog barking at an individual cow."
 "Well, was not that my purpose?" I asked.
 "An artist, whether consciously or unconsciously, always shows in his productions the thing nature aims at, not what she has actually produced," said Fritz.
 "Which means?" I queried.
 "That the beholder of your work, if it is a picture or sculpture, should forget in its contemplation that he is gazing at a representation of this or that individual cow, or dog, or tree, or man, or whatever else it may be, but should behold in it the very idea of cow, dog, tree or man. And if it is a poem or music it should conjure up in the mind of the hearer those elemental ideas which are true at all times and everywhere and not merely the individual happenings which are true only here and now. The camera and the phonograph give us the individual and therefore the perishable. It is the artist, the genius, who places before us even the individual objects in such a way that the species which they represent shine through them. And this it is that gives their works an enduring character. Their paintings, sculptures, poems, music are as imperishable as the ideas themselves which inspired them."

Fritz has acquired some questionable fame in Stockholm. Last week he got into a snarl with an English lord over a question of nationality. The Britisher tweaked Fritz's nose as proof of the superiority of the English over the Germans, whereupon Fritz knocked him down. Friends hurried both away in cabs, but they had been recognized, and the newspapers gave amusing accounts of the encounter.
 1914—20 July.

Fritz LAUNIG sent for me early this morning. He was locked up in a police station. I had to enlist the interest of Captain Larsen's most influential friends to persuade the authorities to accept bail. Fritz had met his English enemy again, and the original quarrel was renewed. This time, it seems, Fritz took the initiative, and when his lordship spoke menacingly of his Majesty our Kaiser Fritz's fist—a most ponderous weapon—shot out and, catching the Briton on the chin, felled him. The poor fellow is in a hospital.
 To me it has always seemed silly to discuss either nationality or religion with one who takes radically opposite views. Sven, too, shares my opinion.
 "Whenever I hear anybody brag about the country to which he belongs," said Sven, on learning of the sinister turn the encounter between Fritz and the Englishman had taken, "I always make up my mind that he must be lacking in personal merits and in order to count for something has to fall back upon the reflected lustre of the country from which he hails. This it is that makes people so viciously vengeful when their nation is slighted. At heart it is not their nation for which they care, but it is the dimming of their own lustre which they dread to lose the moment the national greatness is threatened with an eclipse."

Fritz said he felt sorry he had given away to anger. "Not only on account of the trouble it has brought upon me," he said, "but because I feel a real pity for the Englishman. Usually I have made it a practice to place myself in the position of a person who says or does something which offends me."
