YOU SAID IT. A man may drive with the Hagen way. Far and straight down the open way.

The victory of the Oxford-Cambridge relay team gives Great Britain the "jump" contest so far as the international go, and with it go American congratulations.

ENTER L. CADORE. Apart from the acclaim that has surrounded such pitching talent as Walter Johnson, Grover Alexander, Eddie Cicotte and the like, there is one state of mind that has not been mentioned.

OUR UNCLE SAMUEL stepped into a fast one in the first of the international events, but there is still a considerable stretch of spring and summer on ahead.

There's not a hurler in the league that has anything on our own Jimmy Zinn when he's working right. He has everything a twifter could have and he proved it to everyone's satisfaction yesterday.

LUCILE M. BURNETT'S STUNTS FEATURE COWBOY SPORTS ON SECOND DAY OF ROUND-UP

The threatening weather did not dampen the ardor of Round-Up enthusiasts yesterday in the least, and once again 4,000 people turned out to witness one of the finest exhibitions of trick riding, roping and bucking ever staged in this section of the country.

LUCILLE M. BURNETT.

Mrs. Lucille Mulhall Burnett's lariat throwing, steer roping and exhibition riding was one of the features of the performance. Included in her exhibition of trick roping, was her stunt of roping four horses at one and the same time.

Joe Lynch, New York boxer, knocked Griffin out the last time he met. He only won a decision over Goodman. Jack Sharkey, who fought Champion Pete Herman to a draw in two contests at Philadelphia, fought Lynch to a draw. Goodman fought Sharkey to a draw.

Griffin on the other hand will have every incentive to put forth his best to bring home the bacon. In view of Manager Edward's promise to give him a shirt at the title, Edwards will offer Griffin, if he succeeds here, a match with Pete Herman in Wichita Falls July 4.

Griffin's main standby in his efforts here will be his punch. He carries a wallop with a remarkable kick in it for a man of his weight.

Major League Bits

Yesterday's hero: Powell, outfielder of the Braves. With a brilliant catch he robbed Stengel of a home run and knocked one himself in the next time up. Score: Boston, 3; Philadelphia, 6.

Ferdie Schupp walked five of the eight Reds that faced him in the first inning and the Cardinals lost 15 to 11. Neale was given the game by Umpire Moran.

Claude Williams won his sixth straight game, setting Cleveland back 6 to 1. The Sox knocked Caldwell out in the seventh inning.

Two singles, two doubles, a triple and a homer in the last three innings gave the Pirates four runs but they lost to the Cubs, 6 to 4.

Schmandt could not pick a grounder up on first base in the 11th and let in the run that enabled the Glants to beat the Dodgers 7 to 6.

Perkins, Athletic's catcher, had a big day. He batted in three of the runs that beat the Red Sox 5 to 4.

The Tigers took another drubbing from the Browns, 10 to 4. The Senators drove Shore off the mound in the first inning and beat the Yanks 6 to 5.

LOVE TALES TERSELY TOLD

A Ride in the Morning

By Elsie Endicott

The first place, the fire had gone out over night. Now, there is nothing so well calculated to start the day wrong for a woman as for her to find a cold stove when she had expected glowing coals. And then the stove would smoke in spite of all she could do. With the first blaze gushed a pungent blue cloud. Val's nose ran and her eyes smarted. To make matters worse, Sam came running in from his garden to see if the house was on fire.

"You don't know enough to build a fire," he remarked. In two minutes he had a merry blaze. But by that time all the joy of the day was out of Val.

With such a beginning heavy pan-sakes and weak coffee were apt to be expected.

"I've got a hard day before me and I'd like a breakfast that was fit to eat," Sam sighed. Then he rose, jammed his hat down upon his head, and went away without so much as a good-by.

Whereupon Val went all over the dishes as she cleared the table of its unsatisfactory meal. As a natural consequence she dropped the pink china cream pitcher and broke it. Now, that pink pitcher had adorned her breakfast table every morning. Not only the cream was spilled, but the memories also. She could wipe up the cream, but the memories had vanished utterly.

The first happy morning when she and Sam had eaten breakfast together and all the happy mornings for a long time after—of late Sam and she had not been getting along good together. She began to wonder if she had not made a mistake when she married Sam instead of Al Fletcher with his money and his new automobile. Not that she had liked Al anywhere near as well as she had liked Sam, but there were some things that one could not well overlook. Somehow she thought of Al now as she gathered up the broken bits of china.

It was unfortunate that Val should be carrying the remains of the pink pitcher out to the garbage barrel behind the house just as Al Fletcher's shining new car swung down Warner street. He waved and Val waved back. The next instant the car stopped.

"Come on!" Al cried.

"What do you want?" asked Val.

"Don't you want to go for a little ride out Burnwood way?" invited Al.

Just for a moment Val hesitated. After all, habit is strong, and every little household task awaiting her within seemed, to detain her. Besides, Sam might not like her going with Al. Well, suppose he didn't. And it was such a wonderful morning, and she was so blue and why not, if she wanted to?

"Yes, I'll go," she called, and ran into the house. In two minutes she had her black hat pinned on and her arms through the sleeves of her corduroy coat. Then she locked the door behind her, tucked the key under the mat, and climbed into the car beside Al.

"Now, this seems like old times," Al said, as the car skipped over a crossing and shot forward into a green lane. "I'm lucky for once in my life. If the way to Burnwood hadn't led by your house I'd never have seen you."

"And if I hadn't broke the pink pitcher I'd never have seen you," Val replied.

"You see, Val," Al said presently, "this is just where you belong—with me in this car. I don't believe Sam will ever be able to get you out."

Val flushed. She didn't like Al's saying that. "Oh, I don't know," she retorted. "He may. Of course, we're just paying for our home now."

"My house is all paid for," Al said. "And it's empty—still. You know why, Val?"

Val hung her head. She felt uncomfortable. She felt that Al ought not to be saying things like that. Of course he had once asked her to marry him, and she had refused him because she had come to the conclusion that she could live without him very easily. But Sam she had not been able to live without. So she had married Sam. She had taken him for better, for worse. If he could not buy her a $2,000 automobile she ought to have thought of that before she promised to live without one so long as she had Sam. It was not Sam's fault. He was doing the best he could. But she wasn't going to tell Al that unless she had to.

Al drove his car with one hand while he lit a cigar. The breeze drove the smoke into Val's face. She hated cigars. Sam did not smoke at all. He said that money was too precious to be burned up, and then he bought her a box of chocolates. "Well, that's different," he always laughed. Al smoked without as much as asking permis-

When he had finished that cigar he lit another, and another. Between his cigars and managing his car he did not talk much. And Val could follow no train of thought she pleased.

At Burnwood he stopped before the general store and went in to talk with the man he had gone to see. He left her sitting in the car. A girl with a varied assortment of hair and a dress that was too fancy for anything but the vaudeville stage took Val a dish of ice cream. She did not stay to talk, but hurried back into the store, where Val saw her laughing with her face close to Al's. When at last Al came out smoking, the girl waved him a good-by.

By this time Val's opinion of her own self had fallen a great way. Al's manner toward the girl in the fancy dress was almost identical with his manner toward her. The fact that he made no distinction she took to be no compliment to herself. She drew as far away from him as she could and turned her head to escape some of the cigar smoke.

She was not enjoying her ride so much after all. And it was not all on account of Al's incessant smoking, though that was a sure indication of the fact that he was an altogether different Al from the one who had proposed to her five years before. She was sorry she had come with him.

They were a mile out of town when a tire blew out. Al began to swear. That was another thing Sam never did.

"It doesn't do any good to swear," she said sharply.

"Excuse me. You've never tried to mend a tire," Al answered—just as sharply. "Come, get out, and find something to sit on. This is going to take time."

"How far out are we?" she asked.

"About a mile, I guess. He was getting the jack under the wheel."

"Is that all?" Relief sprang into Val's face. "Thank you very much for my ride, Al," she said. "I can't wait for you to fix that tire. I'm going home. I've got to see about Sam's dinner."

Val started. She did not run until she was out of sight of the car. She made up her mind that she would get to Warner street before Al and his car did, if she died in the attempt. In fact, she ran almost that long mile in a sun that was getting hotter each moment. She cut every corner and landed on her back steps panting and covered with perspiration. As she sat there getting her breath she saw Al's car shoot by. This time he was not looking for her.

When Sam got home to dinner he found dinner ready and everything hospitable and tidy. "Did you think I was pretty mean to you this morning?" he asked Val. He put his arm about her and looked anxiously into her flushed face. "I don't know what got into me," he added apologetically. "I was mean, too," Val said. She lifted her face.

At the table Sam said: "I see Al Fletcher's got him a new $2,000 car. That fellow's making a stack of money." He sighed. "Don't you ever wish you'd taken him instead of me, do you, Val?"

Val looked straight into his eyes. "I wouldn't have Al Fletcher if he had ten cars," she replied emphatically.

Then she told him the story of that morning's ride.

Very.

"I noticed the doctor's car at your door yesterday afternoon. Was it anything serious?"

"Very serious. It hasn't smiled yet."

The "Bonaparte House" stood like a grim sentinel on the old turnpike road at Natural Bridge. It was a long, massive structure of wood, and it had port-holes on all sides, giving it the appearance of a fortress.

It was entirely out of place in New York state. It looked as though it belonged in France or England, or possibly to the early days of Indian warfare.

But the fact was, Joseph Bonaparte, brother of the great Napoleon, built it, and he occupied it with his body-guard of soldiers whom he had brought with him to America when he, with his brother Napoleon, lost their thrones and their power.

Joseph bought a great many acres of land around Natural Bridge, and he had his hunting ground near by, surrounding a beautiful lake which still bears the name of Bonaparte. He continually feared attack from his enemies, even when living in peaceful America, and he was always armed.

Bonaparte had long ago returned to France. He was dead and his soldiers who had roamed with him through the forests about the little village of Natural Bridge, were also dead. But the "Bonaparte House" still stood, though weatherbeaten and in poor repair.

Not for ten years or more had it been occupied for any length of time. And there was a good reason for this. The Bonaparte House was haunted! So everybody said who had ever lived in it! Several times men of the town had resolved to solve the mystery, and had remained in the house over night, but they always reported the same strange noises and uncanny rappings!

Some of the less superstitious folk insisted that it was rats that made the night hideous for anyone occupying the building; but still, the conviction persisted that the Bonaparte House was haunted!

A college chum of mine hailed from Natural Bridge, and he told me about this, and we agreed together that during our summer vacation we would spend one night in the old house!

It was a warm night in July. Wallace and I had dragged a couple of cot beds up to the second floor of the house, and at about 10 o'clock we laid down to peaceful slumbers.

I expected to hear rats running through the walls and across the attic floor; but after retiring we listened in vain. There was no noise or sound of any kind. The house was as still as a grave.

Finally I fell asleep. I hadn't slept long, however, when I was conscious of strange, persistent sounds as of treading feet, and a monotonous clank! clank! clank on the floor. I was terribly frightened for a moment, and was unable to speak. I tried to call out to Wallace, my chum, but I was speechless, and was even unable to move. I wondered if he saw the same strange apparitions that I saw! For I had already opened my eyes, and was looking toward the chamber door which opened into a broad colonial hall. The moon was shining through the window beside my bed, and cast deep, spectre shadows across the floor. The moon also shone into a hall window and dimly illuminated the floor by the door of my chamber.

Gazing out into the semi-darkness of the hall, and hearing the monotonous clank! clank! clank! and the steady falling of footsteps, I actually beheld the greatest tableau or moving picture of my life's experience! There they were!—the forms of actual French soldiers of Bonaparte's day, in full uniform, carrying heavy guns up on their shoulders, passing by in a steady procession! Two or three of them wore huge cumbersome swords at their belts which clanked upon the floor with each step taken by the spectre shapes.

I looked and looked! It was a strange, weird, and yet a wonderful sight! It not only paralyzed me, it fascinated me! They were handsome fellows, I thought, large and broad-shouldered, splendid types of the soldier of any period in history. I speculated as to which one of the passing men might be Joseph Bonaparte, and once I almost believed that a fellow took a passing look at me, and I thought his face was round and dark and noble. He seemed to be smiling a little, and I imagined that he tried faintly to speak.

I was enjoying the passing tableaux, lying still in my cot with my head resting upon my hand, when suddenly I was startled by somebody shaking me roughly.

I opened my eyes, and the sweat was standing out on my forehead. I looked toward the hall door, and saw nothing. Wallace was right—I had been dreaming!

"I sure thought I saw them!" I gasped.

"Saw what?" he asked.

"Why—the whole French army!—Bonaparte's body-guard!"

Wallace laughed. "You saw nothing," he said, perfectly cool. "But I have been hearing something for the past ten minutes! It sounds as though coming from the wall—there," and he pointed at a certain section of the wall.

We listened. We soon heard the familiar (to me) clank! clank! clank! It was certainly spooky and weird. Wallace produced a chisel and ran it along the wall.

"Look at this!" he exclaimed. He had found a definite crack in the old wall which he traced with his chisel, and found it to be a hidden door! With great difficulty we pulled out a large partition, and using our searchlights, we entered a dark cavernous room!

That room was absolutely the most interesting place I ever looked into! Joseph Bonaparte had used it for a sort of armory, and he had left several heavy swords hanging to the wall, and breastplates, and strangely patterned helmets, and pistols! Just as we entered the room we heard rats scurry to their holes. Evidently they had been scurrying in our room, and had moved the hanging swords which clanked weirdly against the wall.

Wallace and I remained in the old house until morning. Then we decided to have our fun, and we dressed up in Joseph's fighting clothes—breast-plates, and helmets, carrying his heavy side-arms and pistols, and emerged triumphantly, marching down into the village.

There was some excitement in Natural Bridge that morning! Old and young were attracted by our strange costumes and the clanking of our side-arms and swords on the sidewalk. Men were frightened, and women cried and children screamed. We were careful to keep our faces covered.

Then the ghosts of old Bonaparte's body guard exclaimed a half-witted old resident who trembled with fear. And we heard other similar remarks as we strode through the town.

Going out into the country we doffed our strange apparel, and then returned to the village grocery store to display our souvenirs, and to destroy the superstition that the old Bonaparte House was "haunted." We knew it wasn't!

Not a Fine Out.

Bob—Didn't I say you call to you now car today?

Green—Yes; I was out for a trial.

Was the trial satisfactory?

No—the judge fined me $10.

SEBORRHEA IS KILLING HAIR
Everyone knows that the man and woman of America are losing their hair.
The prevalence of seborrhea (the dandruff disease) is appalling. But just as science proved that dandruff was due to bacilli, science now offers the remedy.
It is FAMMO.
FAMMO destroys the dandruff bacilli and stops the seborrhean secretion. It stops all itching of the scalp.
It penetrates the scalp and makes the hair roots are entirely dead, it encourages and stimulates the growth of new hair.
The ingredients of FAMMO have never before been used in the treatment of the scalp. But they are well known to medical science.
Three years were spent in perfecting FAMMO in one of the large pharmaceutical laboratories of Detroit.
FAMMO makes the hair and scalp healthy. It restores the hair to a wonderful way and makes it lustrous and healthy.
FAMMO comes in two sizes—25 cents and a big bottle at $1. Your money back if you are not satisfied.
Seborrhea is the medical name for a scaly disease of the scalp. The seborrheic secretion forms in scales or flakes and is commonly known as dandruff.

BAILEY'S DUTY.

The Dallas Journal's comment on the declaration of former Chairman Nichols that former Senator Bailey would continue in the race for governor is fairly typical of other comment, editorial and individual:

That very efficient campaign manager, Mr. Nickels, accompanies his announcement that Mr. Bailey will continue in the race for governor of Texas with certain interesting observations. The most impressive of these is the following:

"The democracy of Texas is not bluffed, bullied or brow-beaten. That's the sweeping truth. The democracy of Texas is not bluffed, bullied or brow-beaten. It will prove that with a solar-plexus in the Saturday conventions. The democracy of Texas can not be bluffed, bullied or brow-beaten. It will prove that with a knockout in the July primary, to the everlasting satisfaction of those who may entertain the slightest doubt in the matter."

Mr. Nickels is right about that. But he errs in believing that the politicians were responsible for the terrible drubbing of Mr. Bailey in the precinct conventions. The people of Texas, not the politicians, administered that bona fide citizens of Texas who have resided continuously in this state, contributing to its progress and prosperity. They made a good job of it, too; Mr. Nickels will admit it, and they'll make a better job of it in July. Never say die! The unbluffable, unbullied, unbrow-beaten, self-respecting, straight-hitting, forward-looking democracy of Texas will live forever.

The over-confidence of overzealous friends led the former senator into the mistake of working for re-election of the democratic administration. The result is so overwhelmingly one-sided—the former senator showed no particular strength anywhere in the state—that we should think his repeated statement that he desired no public office, that his candidacy "merely was to give impulse to his principles" should be put into action. There are constructive efforts needed in Texas along material lines. If material reconstruction is worse needed than factional politics—and most of us believe that is true—the Houston Post's suggestion to the former senator is sound: "The best service Senator Bailey could render to the democracy for whose welfare he professes such solicitude, and to the devoted friends who have followed him in disaster, would be to remove himself as an issue in Texas politics. Only in this way can a still more crushing humiliation and disappointment for him and them be averted." And the Post might have added that only so can two more months of futile, personal factional politics be avoided in Texas.

SEND UNINSTRUCTED DELEGATES.

We are inclined to agree with the suggestion of an exchange which thinks the movement to instruct the Texas delegation to San Francisco for Mr. McAdoo is "of doubtful propriety, since the question of candidates did not enter into the recent primary." Mr. McAdoo right now is probably the outstanding candidate on the democratic side of the fence; he is a very good man, a very capable man, a very honest man, who stands generally for the things that we stand for. But since Texas democrats started out on the plan to send an uninstructed delegation except that it must be friendly to President Wilson and the achievements of his administration, why not play the string out and send a Texas delegation that we can trust to do the right thing in the way of nominations and platform. Circumstances at San Francisco may be widely different from what they are now; the republicans will have made their nominations then and party strategy may dictate actions that do not seem necessary now. Mr. McAdoo himself urges uninstructed delegations, and with the selection of the right kind of men to San Francisco apparently sure, that, under the conditions, is the kind we think Texas should send. Eight years ago the Texas delegation was instructed for Mr. Wilson; but he won the instructions in a straight-out fight over other candidates. This year there were no candidates mentioned and with no outstanding democratic candidate so far appearing on the scene, we can see no good and some possible harm from sending a delegation tied up to anybody's candidacy, even though that body be as excellent a man as Mr. McAdoo. Texas democrats at Dallas this month should select the right kind of delegation and trust to them to do that which is best for the whole party under the circumstances as they are when the nomination is made.

HOROSCOPE

"The stars motion, but do not compel." (Copyright, 1918, by the authors Newspaper Syndicate.)

Saturday, May 8, 1920. The Sun dominates today, ruling for the good of more and the aspect is supposed to be especially fortunate for all who seek material things. It is a time to project personal ambitions and to push individual plans. Helpfulness and co-operation are supposed to be much easier to obtain under this sway than under other planets.

The Sun foreshadows added power to persons already in positions of influence, except in the case of those who have reached the ultimate of attainment and for them a diminution of success is indicated. During this sway luck will seem to be a stronger factor than it should be and success for those who seemingly have not earned it is prognosticated. This will apply especially to women.

Gifts presented under this planetary sway are believed to be unusually pleasing and to bring good fortune. Saturn and Uranus seem to warn of secret enemies and tendencies toward intrigue and treachery on the part of pretended friends.

Selfishness is supposed to be nurtured by conditions as they exist in business affairs, and there will be a tendency to overcome the trend toward progress and reform encouraged in war days. The sinister stars that seem to encourage all reactionary forces will bring the subject of prohibition into prominence, but the stars give warning that ill luck attends any step backward in the new era.

Because men's hearts have been hardened since the war they must again meet its horrors, astrologers prophesy. Dangers menace this country as well as those in Europe, the stars seem to indicate. The Middle West is subject to planetary influences making for great political excitement and big events that effect national affairs. Persons whose birthday it is have the augury of a successful year in business. Those who are employed will benefit greatly.

Children born on this day will be fortunate in financial and business affairs. These subjects of Taurus should have great initiative and enterprise. ## CHANGES ARE TO BE MADE IN COUNTY ROAD CONTRACT

Definite decision to re-write certain clauses of the county road contract signed one month ago by the county commission and representatives of Potts & Prentice, was reached late Friday at a mass meeting of citizens held in the county court room. A committee of five citizens will be appointed by Judge R. E. Huff, who presided at the meeting, to meet with the county commissioners and representatives of Potts & Prentice and the re-writing of certain objectionable clauses contained in the present contract will be discussed. Judge Huff indicated Friday that the citizens' committee will include W. F. Weeks. Remaining members of the committee will be appointed shortly. The suggestion for the citizens' committee was made by G. Clint Wood.

Rollen J. Windrow, state highway engineer, attended the meeting. He announced that the contract agreed upon between the county commission and Potts & Prentice, contractors, was satisfactory to the state highway commission and that the commission had sufficient faith in the contractors to designate $200,000 toward the building of Wichita county's highway system. Following the conference Mr. Windrow said:

"The state highway commission wants this dispute settled at once in order that work on the Wichita county highways may go forward. The state highway commission has designated $200,000 toward the building of these highways and I am now in a position to offer the county $50,000 additional highway aid provided the work will go forward immediately. In case the county continues to delay the building of this system, however, the state highway commission will withdraw this entire amount of $250,000 assistant fund and place it elsewhere."

W. M. Priddy advocated delay in the construction of the permanent county highways contending that a delay of two years would mean a great saving to the county inasmuch as construction material will likely decline within that period. Mr. Priddy referred to the highway system of Virginia where he said road problems existed very similar to those confronted by counties of Northwest Texas. The Virginia highways have been constructed by methods by which thousands of dollars had been saved. He urged that the Virginia system be studied before final action was taken by the county commissioners here.

Wood Urges Action. G. Clint Wood urged immediate action declaring "we have got to put confidence in somebody and get away from the idea that everybody is crooked. I've known Robby Potts of Potts & Prentice since early boyhood. I picked cotton with him, and I believe in him. Although it occurs to me that this contract is a rather one-sided affair in favor of the contractors, I believe that the objectionable clauses can be removed or revised and construction of our much-needed highways go forward.

The same grounds gone over at previous meetings of the county commission were discussed and the same alleged objectionable clauses in the contract were pointed out by Fred Weeks and County Auditor W. W. Murphy. R. J. Potts of Potts & Prentice stated that he and his co-workers are willing to open the contract with the object of reaching an amicable agreement.

KNUTSEN BUILDING OWN PLANING MILL

W. K. Knutsen, building contractor, who has won an enviable reputation here for the quality of his workmanship, is soon to begin the operation of a planing mill. Mr. Knutsen is entering the planing mill business primarily for work for his own contracts, but it is probable that he will do other work. The site for the mill is at 1903 Burnett street. Work on the building is in progress. A part of the machinery is already here and Mr. Knutsen expects to have his mill in partial operation within two weeks.

At the Empress. "Truth is stranger than fiction," is an old and trite adage, but, according to House Peters, starring in Equity Pitchers' first big special release, "Silk Husbands and Calico Wives" the day has arrived when intelligent men and women are finding many truths of daily living more strongly exemplified in the fiction than ever before realized.

The story of "Silk Husbands and Calico Wives" written by Monte M. Katterjohn, and made into a special feature production by Harry Garson, is more than fiction. Its subject matter is based on truths and facts of every day life and gleaned from experience. Do you have to wait to become a sadder yet wiser woman? "Silk Husbands and Calico Wives" has been secured as an attraction by the Empress theater and is now being shown.

Ability To Serve

Policies of most companies provide good protection. When you buy insurance, however, your money should secure more for you than what the law requires of insurance companies. Service, which is made up of the agent's ability to secure immediate payment of claims, his ability to handle large lines and place insurance on risks of a hazardous nature, his ability to secure concessions from his companies—These are some of the things you pay for. Do you always get them? Our companies have their own adjuster located permanently in our office to pay claims immediately. Let us prove our ability to serve.
