FUR TRAPPING The Otter

The lumbering otter, with his whiskers and webbed feet, is something of a stunt performer. Living beside the water as he does, with his diet composed almost entirely of fish, he soon becomes an expert swimmer and diver. Like the beaver, when the March sun shines strongly upon the woods, the old otter takes delight in climbing crusted slopes and sliding on a snow chute to the bottom. The trick is not one of which the trapper approves, for it is harmful to the fur, just as is the otter's habit of basking for hours in the hot rays of the sun.

Otters Differ Little The otter is found from Alaska to Labrador, from the Arctic to the southern United States, a distance of 3,000 miles from north to south, but no matter from what locality he comes, he differs very little from other otters. This is in marked contrast to other animals, as the mink or coon, whose size and appearance depend so largely upon the region where they live.

Caught in Many Ways

The animals are caught by spearing, by clubbing, or with nets. Sometimes they are even shot with it in the cone shape. Fasten it in the cone shape. people obtain their living by cap-turing them. The largest are four and one-half feet long, but because of the rolling looseness of the skin, as you will notice in the picture, the pelt may be stretched even larger. Few animals are as hard to skin as the otter. Its hide is tough and cannot be pulled or peeled off, but must be carefully eut.

All water animals caught for their fur-otter, mink, beaver and musk-rat-change the looks of their pelts three, if not four times, during the twelve months. In the Summer, the pelt is a burnt greasy color and the hair is thin. The hair grows thicker in early Autumn, while the pelt turns blue. By the time the cold

Sir Charles Abingdon calls upon Paul Harley criminal investigator and tells him he is much disturbed by parties unknown to him. Harley is asked to dine at the Abingdon home and, when he arrives at the appointed time, the butler informs him the master is calling at the bedside of a sick friend.

When Abingdon returns home he tells Harley of a false message sent so call him to the home of the sick friend. Dinner is served and during the soup course Sir Charles becomes suddenly ill and falls from his chair in a dying state. Dr. McMurdoch pronounces death due to heart failure. Abingdon's last words are "Nicel Brinn" and "Fire-Tongue."
