The car meant a new life for Helen. She drove it early and late, finding new roads, expending herself in swift action, flying away from her thoughts. When, now, she thought of Brent and his charming women friends, she stepped on the gas and flew over the road like mad. It gave her a witd, eerie satisfaction.

But one day it brought trouble. the was near home, going along at a moderate pace down a wind-ing hill when the thought that she was burning up her emotions like so much waste came to her with a clarity that made her resentful. She closed her eyes for an instant. The car hugged the road,
