The Business of the Apothecary is a Mystery—"

King James I of England was the originator of the modern slogan "Your Druggist is more than a merchant." In the 16th century the apothecaries of England were forced to unite with the grocers in a Guild. King James, however, was influenced to give the apothecaries a separate charter, and in reply to the protest of the Grocers Guild he said: Grocers are but merchants; the business of the apothecary is a mystery"—which at that period meant art or profession.

And pharmacists as a class have entrenched themselves ever since as professional men. Colleges of Pharmacy have been established. The problems that face the pharmacist in the materials he handles make it necessary for him to have a wide acquaintance with the sciences upon which his art depends. In order to maintain a prescription pharmacy, he must be a merchant, too.
