Muleshoe Makes World Take Note In Sudan Seed

According to the Government report, "Muleshoe is the center of the Sudan grass seed industry in the world," and in 1926 of the 14 million pounds handled in the world, 90 per cent of it was produced and marketed from Texas and half of that in Muleshoe territory.

Sudan grass, which is regarded as the best meadow crop in the world for dairy cattle, is the surest crop of West Texas. It is now produced in practically every state of the union, but this section of West Texas furnishes the big end of the seed. Forty acres of sudan grass is generally conceded to be equal to two sections of native grass for cattle feeding.

During the past twelve months the product from Muleshoe has been shipped to every state in the Union and much of it was sold to export of seed.

Sudan is grown by the dry land farmers, and is considered one of the best money crops. The seed from this particular part of the Plains is considered better for the high altitude makes the germination superior to the lower climate.

Muleshoe Girls Win From Sudan Friday

On last Friday afternoon the Muleshoe girls basket ball team drove over to our sister city. Sudan, and gave their girls team K. K. Smith a beating to the tune of 36 to 16. We are all proud of our girls basket ball team, for they have never lost a game. The team is not so large but when it comes to speed and action they are hard to stay up with. A number of the teams they have played world's largest producer of gear this season were much heavier shift cars, is preparing for the but were lacking in speed and greatest year in its history, team work.

the Brooks Theatre tonight (Friday) Feb. 18th and Saturday the 19th.

His name was S. P. Rockett, but everyone called him 'Speedy, "The Mile a Minute Man." His specialty was high-powered autos which he manufactured and raced for his dad--old 'Ironsides' Rockett. "Speedy,s" dearest eneiny was Paula Greydon, whose mother controlled the Greydon "Greyhound" auto plant. "Speedy's" "Rockett" has always beaten Greydon's "Greyhound" for speed but one day Paula gave "Speedy" the horse laugh by making him take her dust in a road race.

Underground influences at work to secure control of these two famous factories now cast shadows over two life-long friendships and where once good natured rivalary held sway there was strife and enmity.

William Fairbanks has an ideal role as the clean-cut, fast-acting and think-"super" of an auto Methodist Church factory specializing in speed cars. The action starts with a whiz and gathers speed like a comet up to a smashing climax in which air-planes, racing cars and the fastest moving things on earth are combined. Muleshoe is located in one of the best shallow water districts in the United States, and the land is of vurious kinds and one can find the proper soil for every kind of fruit or vegetable. The people of Muleshoe do not have the slightest idea of the value of this land with all the water added to it. In many places land like ours will sell for $200 and up. Here one can buy the best, ranging from $45 to $125, according to improvements and location.

Generals Met en Porch.

And when he virtually had achieved the independence of his country George Washington invited all the generals who had helped him win the battle of Yorktown to visit Fredericksburg and to meet his mother and sister. There on that porch they talked over the great victory and the happy days that dawned ahead.

At the exposition, Miss Washington, who comes from Fauquier county, Virginia, sat on the steps of Great-Great-Grandaunt Betty's house, looking out into the bit of garden before the door. where ivy grew from four of Washington's Virginia homes, and strummed a banje, and sang old songs that have been handed down in the family since the days of her great-great-grandfather, Samuel Washington, George Washington's brother.

She is a Carter as well as a Washington-her mother descended from "King" Carter, a baronial Virginian of early days, who earned his title by the way in which he ruled over the destinies of the colonists of the Northern Neck, a great domain ceded to him by his monarch and personal friend, King Charles II.

Many strange vicissitudes did the old mansion suffer before the Kenmore association was formed, four years ago, to rescue Kenmore and preserve it as a historic spot.

Site and Mansion Bought.

The site and the mansion now have been bought, thanks to gifts of $30,-000, from a host of generous donors. But further funds still are needed o complete the work of restoring the nansion to its pristine state-that's ne reason why the Kenmore associaon made this exhibit at the Sesquithe to say that not one dollar of apartment house.

In the Kenmere association's exhibit at the Palace of Education photographs were shown of many details of the gracious and dignified interior and exterior of the eld mansion, of its historic furnishings, many of them Washington family heirlooms, and of a horse-chestnut tree still flourishing next to the house-sole survivor of 13 planted there by Washington himself, to shade his mother when she walked over from her home next door.

There were historic pieces in the exhibit, too-such as the side-table once used by Mary Ball Washington, the mother of George Washington, when she dwelt next door to Kenmore.

"Having seen the porch of Kenmore, now don't fail to pay a visit to Kenmore itself!"-so Miss Washington and Mrs. Smith adjured a visitor to the Kenmore association exhibit at the Sesquicentennial.

Historic Battle Scenes.

They promised much reward in such a visit, a sight of the Rappahannock valley, of the rare picturesqueness and natural beauty; a chance to visit the scenes of the battles such as Chancellorsville, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania and the two battles of Fredericksburg-all fought during the Civil war, within fifteen miles of Fredericksburg; and a chance to see the home town of the Washingtons and the Lees, of John Paul Jones, and the seven generals of the Revolutionary war-the town, too, where Madison and Monroe were educated.

Also the scene of the first American Declaration of Independence. The Declaration was adopted at a meeting in Fredericksburg of a committee of which Colonel Lewis was chairman, on April 29, 1775, fifteen months before a certain well-known Fourth of July, and twenty days before the Mecklenburg (N. tion between the subject chesen by the lesson committee and the passages of Scripture selected. The first exhibits the responsibilities of the subjects of the Messiah's kingdom, and the second pictures the graces which were upon the members of the primitive church. Definite recognition should be given this in our interpretation of the passages.

I. The Responsibilities of the Subjects of Messiah's Kingdom-(Matt. 5:13-16).

The whole mass of mankind is shown in the Scriptures to be corrupt-the whole world in moral and spiritual darkness. It is the high privilege and solemn responsibility of the subjects of the kingdom to exert a saving and uplifting influence on the world in which they live. They are to live such lives as to purify and enlighten. This can only be done in the measure that they personally know Jesus Christ, the King, and strive to make known His glory and power to others.

1. "Ye are the salt of the earth" (v. 13).

The properties of salt are: (1) Penetrating. This means that the disciples must not separate themselves from the world, but thrust themselves into its activities. Salt must be brought into contact with the substance to be affected by it.

(2) Purifying. The influence of the disciples of Christ is to uplift and purify.

(3) Preserving. Salt has the tendency to arrest decay. The influence of believers tends to save the world from perishing in its own vices.

"Ye are the light of the world" 2. (v. 14).

THE PIGS' RIDE

Strangely enough Daddy had not told the children a story about an airship in a long, long time, and certainly, he said to himself, another story must not be told about anything before he told an airplane story.

Nick loved to get hold of all the pictures he could to see just how the airplanes did look and how they really did fly.

So when Daddy told them he had an airplane story for them both Nick and Nancy were delighted.

"I am going to tell you this evealag." said Daddy, "a story about three little pigs and their ride in an airship.

There was a young man who owned an airship. But beaides this he also had a small farm, and three little young pigs had just been added to it. "The young man thought the little pigs were so cunning that he hardly wanted to leave them, even for his airship, of which, of course, he was very fond.

"So the only thing left for him to do, he decided, was to take the little pigs for a trip in the airship.

"When he asked the little pigs if they would like to fly with him they did look very much surprised. griping. "As they didn't know what to say

"The little pigs were not at all frightened, and they seemed to like the clouds. "The young man decided that they must like extreme things, for they liked to get under the earth, and they seemed to very much enjoy getting way up in the air.

"Of course they squealed, but they squealed for joy, and they were just as good as could be.

"When they got to earth again after a good, long trip they really seemed to be very much disappointed that such a fine trip had come to an end. "Then when they got to the barn-

Don't mix a mess of mustard, flour and water when you can relieve pain, soreness or stiffness with a little clean, white Musterole.

Musterole is made of pure oil of mus-tard and other helpful ingredients, and takes the place of mustard plasters.

Musterole usually gives prompt relief from sore throat, broachitis, tonsillitis, croup, stiff neck, asthma, neuralgia, headache, congestion, pleurisy, rheumatism, lumbago, pains and aches of the back or joints, sprains, sore muscles, bruises, chilblains, frosted feet, colds of the chest (it may prevent pneumonia).

CHAPTER XII—Continued

--12--"Oh, Charlie!" whispered Lydia, horror in her blue eyes and her parted lips. She looked at him in utter dismay. No longer was he the debonair favorite of the high school. In his somber eyes, his thin, cold lips, his tense shoulders the young girl saw the savage. But she knew the tale was true.

She moistened her dry lips. "But what can I do, Charlie! I'm only a girl."

"I'll tell you what you can do. You can throw down your murderer friend and side with me. You can get everyone you know to side with me. And, Lydia, never tell Levine, or anyone else, what you know about him. It wouldn't be safe!"

He leaned toward her as he spoke and Lydia shivered. "I won't," she whispered. Then she said aloud in oudden resentment, "But I'm not going to throw Mr. Levine down without his having a chance to explain. Who are you to think you've got a right to as' me? I'm just a girl. I want to be happy just a little while before I grow up. I've had too much unhappiness."

"Yes, you have had," agreed Char-He, grimly, "and that's why you will think about it in spite of yourself. You understand how I feel because you've suffered. When are you going to throw Levine down?"

Lydia's face whitened. "Never!" she said.

"What! When you know he's murderer?"

"He never intended to kill your father. Anyhow, I can't help what he's done. He's like my own father and brother and mother all in one to me." The two young people sat looking into each other's eyes. Suddenly Charlie threw Lydia's hand from him, and, like Billy Norton, he strode down the path and out of the gate without · word.

Levine did not appear at the cottage for several days. During that time Lydia tried to put Charlie's story out of her mind.

When John did come out she avoided talking to him and he caught her several times looking at him with a sad and puzzled expression. When they started on their usual Sunday walk. Amos went back to the house for his cane and Levine said, abruptly, "Out with it, young Lydia! Been hearing more stories about my wickedness?

Lydia nodded, miserably.

"My dear," Levine said quietly, "this is a man's game. I'm playing a roughand-tumble, catch-as-catch-can fight, In it the weak must fail and maybe die. But out of it great good will come to this community. As long as the Indians are here to exploit, this community will be demoralized. I'm using every means, fair or foul, to carry my purpose. Can't you let it go at that?"

Lydia set her teeth. "Yes, I can

Lydia raised a startled face. "No! No! I'd rather go in rags than borrow money. We're almost out of debt now, and we'll stay out. Don't borrow, daddy," her voice rising hysterically. "Don't borrow!" "All right, dearie, all right!" said

Amos. The matter was not mentioned again directly. But the little scene rankled with Amos. A week or so later he said at supper, "Lydia, I'm thinking seriously of moving. I can borrow enough money, I find, to add to the rent we're paying, to rent the old stone house next to Miss Towne's. My idea is to move there just till you finish college. Then we'll go out on a farm. But it'll give you your chance, Lydia.

Lydia hesitated. To move-into the house next the Townes would be to arrive to enter the inner circle, to cease to be a dowd. But-she looked about the familiar rooms. "Daddy," she said, "would you really want to leave this cottage?' "I'd just as soon," replied Amos.

'Most places are alike to me since your mother's death. I could stand doing without the garden, if I had the farm to look forward to.' "How'd we pay the money back?"

asked Lydia.

"After the Levine bill passes," said Amos, "I'll have a section of pines." Instantly Lydia's sleeping land hunger woke and with it the memory of Charlie's tales. She sat in deep thought.

"Daddy," she said, finally, "we're not going to borrow, and we're not going to move again. What's the use of trying to make a splurge with borrowed money?"

"All right," said Amos, reluctantly. "But remember, you've had your chance and don't feel abused about our poverty."

"I won't," replied Lydia, obediently. And, to her own surprise, she did feel less bitter about her meager, homemade clothing. She had had a chance to improve it and had resisted the temptation.

Late in March the valedictorian and salutatorian of the class were chosen. The custom was for the teachers to select the ten names that had stood highest for scholarship during the entire four years and to submit these to the pupils of the class, who by popular vote elected from these the valedictorian and the salutatorian.

To her joy and surprise, Lydia's was one of the ten names. So were Olga's and Kent's. The day on which the election took place was cold and rainy. Amos, plodding home for supper, was astonished to see Lydia flying toward him through the mud a full quarter of a mile from home. "Daddy, they elected me valedictorian! They did! They did! Olga got four votes and Mamie Aldrich ten and I got sixty-six. Daddy! And Mamie wasn't cross but Olga was. Oh, isn't it wonderful!"

smoothed Lydia's bright hair with his of the girls who had no invitation work-scarred hand. "I tell you, I'll from boys would go. Lydia, herself, would have cut off her hand rather than appear at her own senior ball without a young man.

Mortified and unhappy, she avoided her mates during the last week of school, fearing the inevitable question, "Who is going to take you, Lyd?" The tenth dawned a lovely June day. The exercises began at ten and by half-past eight Lydia was buttoned into her pretty little organdie, Lizzie was puffing in her black alpaca and Amos was standing about in his black Sunday suit, which dated back to his early married days. By ninethirty they had reached the Methodist church and Amos and Lizzie were established in the middle of the front row of the balcony, while Lydia was shivering with fright in the choirroom, where the class was gathered. Somebody began to play the organ and somebody else, who looked like Miss Towne, shoved Lydia toward the door and she led the long line of her mates into the front pews. A college professor spoke at length, then Kent appeared on the platform.

Good old Kent, even if he wouldn't take Lydia to parties! Kent, with his black eyes and hair, his ruddy skin and broad shoulders, was good to look on and was giving his speech easily and well, but Lydia was seeing him ball with me?"

Lydia was too much overcome for speech. She never before had seen a man in a dress suit! It made of Billy a man of the world. Where was the country boy she had snubbed?

"Here are some flowers I hope you'll Billy went on, formally. wear." "Would you mind hurrying? It's pretty late."

"Oh, Billy !" breathed Lydia, at last. 'Aren't you an angel !" In half an hour the two were seated in ile carriage, an actual, party-going, city hack, and bumping gayly on the way to the ball. Lydia's first dancing party! Lydia's first man escort and he wearing a dress suit and there were only two others in the hall! Who would attempt to describe the joy of that evening? Who would have recognized Billy, the farmer, in the cool blond person who calmly appropriated Lydia's card, taking half the dances for himself and parceling out the rest grudgingly and discriminatingly.

For three hours, Lydia spun through a golden haze of melody and rhythm. Into three hours she crammed all the joy, all the thrill, that she had dreamed of through her lonely girlhood. At half after eleven she was waltzing with Billy.

"We must leave now, Lydia," he said. "I promised your father I'd have you home by midnight. I want to get a stand-in with your dad because I want to take you to more parties."

"Oh, Billy! Do you!" breathed Lydia. "Well, I don't think there's any one in the world has nicer things happen to them than I do! Oh, Billy, just this waltz !"

At the end, Lydia looked up with a wondering smile. "I didn't know any one could be so perfectly happy, Billy. I shall always remember that of you-you gave me my happlest moment."

On the way home in the bumping hack, Billy seemed to relax. "Well, did I give you a good time, miss, or didn't I? Could Kent or Gustus have done better?"

"Billy,' said Lydia, "last summer I was just a silly little girl. Now, I'm grown up. You were the swellest person at the ball tonight. You just wait till I tell your mother about it." Billy went up the path with Lydia to the steps and held her hand a moment in silence after he said, "It's a wonderful night !"

A wonderful night, indeed! The moon hung low over the lake and the fragrance of late lilac and of linden blooms enveloped them. Youth and June moonlight and silence! A wonderful night indeed!

"You are very sweet, Lydia," whispered the young man. He laid his cheek for a moment against her hand, then turned quickly away.

Lizzle to accompany him.

Levine returned the last week in

On all sides but one were pine woods. The one side was bordered by a little lake, motionless under the July sun. On the edge of the pines were set dozens of tents and birch-bark wick-1-ups. In the center of the meadow was a huge flagpole from which drooped the Stars and Stripes. Already the meadow was liberally dotted with sightseers of whom there seemed to be as many Indians as whites. "Isn't it great!" cried Lydia. "What do we do first?"

"Well," said Levine, "I'm free until three o'clock, when the speeches begin. There'll be all sorts of Indian games going until then." "This is just a celebration and nothing else, John, isn't it?" asked Amos. "That's all," replied Levine. "We thought it was a good way to jolly the Indians. At the same time it gave folks a reason for coming up here and seeing what we were fighting for and, last and not least, it was the Indian agent's chance to come gracefully over on our side. He's done more of the actual work of getting the celebration going than I have."

"I wonder why?" asked Billy, suddenly.

"All there is left for him to do." said Levine. "Lydia, before the speeches begin, go up in the pines and choose your tract. I'll buy it for you."

"The whole thing's wrong," muttered Billy.

Levine gave him a quick look, then smiled a little cynically. "You'd better go along with Lydia and take a look at the pines." he suggested. "I'd like to look at the pines again," said Lydia. "Come along, Billy." They entered the woods in silence and followed a sun-flecked atsle until the sound of the celebration was muffled.

Billy leaned against one of the great tree trunks and stared thoughtfully about him.

"I'm all mixed up, Lydia," he said. 'It's all wrong. I know the things Levine and the rest are doing to get this land are wrong, and yet I don't see how they can be stopped. I came up here last month to see how bad off the Indians were. And I saw the poor starving, diseased brutes and I cursed by white breed. And yet, Lyd, I saw a tract of pine up in the middle of the reservation that I'd sell my soul to own!"

There was understanding in Lydia's eyes. "Oh, the pines are wonderful," she exclaimed. "If one could only keep them forever! And I suppose that's the way the Indians feel about them, too !"

"It's all wrong," muttered Billy. 'It's all wrong, and yet," more firmly, "the reservation is doomed and if we don't take some of it. Lydia, we'll not be helping the Indians-but just being foolish."

"To have it and hold it for your children's children," exclaimed Lydia, passionately. "You and yours to live on it forever. And yet, I'd see a dead Indian baby and starving squaws behind every tree. I know I would." "I tell you what I'm going to do," said Billy, doggedly. "I'm going to get hold of that tract. I'm not going

A Simple Method of Prevention.

There is no disease more offensive or disagreeable, or no disease that will lead to as much serious trouble as catarrh or chronic colds. It often produces chronic headaches and deafness, affecting the eyes and voice, and frequently weakening the lungs. Get rid of catarrh by a simple, safe, pleasant home remedy, discovered by Dr. Blosser, a catarrh specialist.

Dr. Blosser's remedy is composed of medic- . inal herbs, berries and flowers, which you smoke in a small pipe or cigarette. The smoke vapor is inhaled into the air passages of the nose, head, throat and lungs, and carries medicine where sprays, douches and ointments cannot possibly reach.

If you suffer with catarrh, catarrhal deafness, asthma, hay fever, bronchial irritations, or if subject to frequent colds, get from your drug store a pocket size package of Dr. Blosser's cigarettes. Prove for yourself their pleasant and beneficial effects.

and I will.' she said, as her father came up with his cane.

And though this was more easily said than done and the thought of murdered chiefs and starved babies troubled her occasionally, she did not really worry over it all as much as she might have were she not entering her senior year in the high school.

After the Christmas holidays Margery departed for an eastern finishing school. The night after her departure Kent made his first call on Lydia in many months. The two withdrew to the kitchen to make candy and there Lydia's surprise and pleasure gave way to suspicion. Kent seemed to want to talk for the most part about Margerv!

"Hasn't she grown to be a beauty?" he said, beating the fudge briskly.

"She always was beautiful," replied Lydia, "though she's an awful silly. She never reads anything, and she funked all her Thanksgiving examinations.'

"Anybody as pretty as Margery doesn't need to be brilliant," said Kent.

"And she spoons, and you don't think much of girls that spoon." Lydfa's cheeks were a deeper pink than usual.

"Shucks, don't be catty, Lydia!" growled Kent.

Kent called several times during the winter, but he never asked Lydia to go to a party nor did any of the other boy friends she saw daily in schoolboys with whom she chummed over lessons, who told her their secrets, who treated her as a mental equal, yet never asked her to call, or slipped boxes of candy into her desk or asked her into a drug store for a sundae or a hot chocolate.

Nobody resented this state of affairs more than old Lizzle. After Kent's third or fourth call, she said to Lydia, closing the door behind him, "Yes, Kent'll come out here and see you, but I notice he don't take you anywhere. If you had fine party clothes and lived on Lake Shore avenue, he'd be bowing and scraping fast enough." Lydia tossed her head. "I don't care about going to parties."

"You do, too," insisted the old lady. "You're eating your heart out. know. I was young once."

Amos looked up from his paper. "Lydia's too young to go if they did ask her. But why don't they ask?"

"It's because I'm too poor and I live so far out and I don't spoon," answered Lydia. "I don't care, I tell you." And just to prove that she didn't care, Lydia bowed her face in her hands and began to cry. A look of real pain crossed Amos'

ce. He got up hastily and went to Lydia's side.

"Valedictorian! My little Lydia! Scholarship and popular vote! I wish your mother was here. I'll write to Levine tonight. He'll have to be here for the exercises."

"And Kent is salutatorian. He won by just two votes. I've got to begin to plan about my dress."

"Now, I'm going to buy that dress, Lydia, if I have to borrow money. You aren't going to begin any talk about earning it."

"Oh, all right," said Lydia, hastily. "You won't have to borrow. White goods is always cheap and I'll get it right away so I can put lots of hard work on it."

"What's your speech going to be about?" asked Amos, as they turned in the gate.

"I haven't had time to think about that. I'll plan it all out while I'm sewing."

Billy did not congratulate Lydia. He passed her just as he had during all the months, with a curt little "Hello." To tell the truth, Lydia was heartily ashamed of herself for her shabby reception of Billy's plea. She knew she had been unkind and she missed the desultory companionship she had had with Billy.

The preparation of the dress went on amazingly well. The speechmaking was less simple. As was customary, Lydia chose the class motto, "Ducit Amor Patriae," for her subject and sweated inordinately to find something to say. She complained bitterly because during the four years at high school nothing at all was taught about love of country, or patriotism, or anything that would make the motto suggestive.

Amos answered her plaint indignantly. "Well, for heaven's sake! And you a descendant of the Puri-Think it out for yourself."

And think it out Lydia did, sitting on the front steps with her sewing and the gate.

in a red bathing suit as he hung Florence Dombey from a yard arm of the willow. What a dear he had been! Now it all was different. They were grown up. This day marked their growing up and Kent didn't want to take her to parties.

Kent bowed and took his seat. The quartette sang and somebody prodded Lydia smartly in the back. She made her way up to the platform and began to speak automatically.

Amos with tight clenched fists and Lizzle with her lips a thin seam of nervous compression, were swelled with vanity and torn with fear lest she forget her lines.

But John Levine, who had dashed in late and stood unnoticed in the crowd under the gallery listened intently, while he yearned over Lydia's immature beauty like a mother.

"And so," she ended, "when we say good-by, you all must remember that we go out into the world resolved to live up to our motto. That we believe with our forefathers that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. That all men are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. And that because the New England people in the Middle West are far from the cradle of liberty where these ideas were born, living among foreigners it behooves the members of our class to carry our motto into their daily life. Love of country leads us, and so farewell !"

It was a foolish, sentimental little speech with one or two real thoughts in it and John Levine smiled even while the tears filled his eyes. He told himself that no one, least of all probably Lydia herself, realized the cynical application of the class motto to Lake City conditions.

The diplomas were distributed. The great morning was over.

After dinner Amos rushed back to the factory. Lydia hung the graduation gown away in her closet and she and Adam spent the afternoon on the lake shore, where the delicate splentans!
