The Growth of Seaweed.

Seaweeds vary surprisingly in their habits of life. Some species grow altogether beneath the water, attaching themselves below the lowest tide level; others frequent heights where they are left dry at every retreating tide, while others yet are found in situations where they are scarcely ever covered by water. Whereas most of them attach themselves to rocks or solid bottom, keeping to the shallows, there are exceptions to the rule, among which the most remarkable is the sargasso or gulf weed, which floats on the surface of the ocean. Immense fields of it are seen by the navigator, extending as far as the eye can reach. It is sometimes so abundant as seriously to interfere with the progress of ships, and it was this which so alarmed the crew of Columbus on his first voyage of dis-

The ferocity of sharks is not necessarily in proportion to their size. For example, there is the great basking shark, so called because of its habit of lying motion-often attains a length of nearly forty feet, but its teeth are small comparatively, and it probably never attacks man, depending upon water like a sail when it is basking. Although sluggish ordinarily and easily harpooned, it exhibits great activity and enormous strength when struck, diving immediately to the bottom and requiring a great length of rope to hold it. These basking sharks are caught for their livers off the coast of Iceland, and the oil obtained is used to adulter-

PAGANINI.

A Genius That Touched the Line Dividing Sanity From Madness.

If ever there was a genius it was Paganini, the violinist, and probanear without crossing the border line that divides sanity and madness. The stories of his antics and eccentricities are endless. His upsmall fishes and crustacea for its bringing was atrocious, but it will diet. Another name for this species | not explain everything. At sixteen is "sailfish," because of its great he was a gambler, a roue and—a back fin, which shows out of the genius. Everything seemed to turn to gold under his marvelous fingers. Money poured in roon him like water. Yet he was at one time reduced to the point of selling his fiddle. He had got down to his last 30 francs. He took them to the roulette table, staked the whole sum on one fling and-won.

The violin thus opportunely rescued came into his possession very curiously. When he was a lad, Parsini, the painter, came one day to his father's house and, putting into the lad's hand a priceless Stradivarius and the score of a concerto of great difficulty, said:

"This," indicating the violin, "shall be yours if you play this," indicating the sheet of music, "at sight without a fault.

And yet when the testimony of people who believe they have seen hosts has been attenuated to the itmost people will still believe. Scie ce may discredit evidence, but it cannot prove that ghosts do not exist. Throughout the ages there is a cumulative mass of testinrony which, though it does not amount to proof, yet commands shuddering repect. The sternest materialism will not eliminate from people's minds that credence in the un known and the undemonstrable which has been handed down to them from the beginnings of time.

Plato himself accepted the existence of ghosts, and he makes Socrates explain their frequenting of graveyards. These ghosts, says the great Athenian, long to re-enter the body in which they could gratify their desires. It is hopeless, bu memory tortures them with vain affection for the fleshly abode in which they formerly dwelt. Shake are is full fealm of snadows But he, too, knows the meaning of chilosophic doubt, for he makes Tamlet wonder whether the image of his father may not be some coinge of his fancy. From Shakespeare's day to now we have advanced in one particular. We know more of the composition of the brain and the susceptibilities of nervous tissue. We are assured today that a man may honestly believe he sees a ghost and yet see nothing but the projection of an image within his own brain. But as to the existence or nonexistence of ghosts we are as ignorant as the ancient Egyptian or the modern redskin. Reason learnedly as we may, we cannot eradicate from our mind that vague feeling, half fear, half lope, that ghosts may be. Sir Thomas Browne touches on this matter with characteristic quaintness. Some people, he says, hope to see a ghost that they may be perscaded of the immortality of the But he adds that the devil all never let them see one, for that would be to turn them away from himself.—Rochester Post-Express.

The Tale of an Odd Adventure in Northern Brazil.

Mr. Edward H. Cooper's article on South America and his reference to its poisonous snakes remind me of an interesting adventure of a friend of mine in northern Brazil.

My friend was making a collection of the poisonous snakes of the neighborhood, and as every one round us was aware of the fact said: many gifts of the kind were offered to him. One evening he was writing at a table in our hut when a local person brought him a small living specimen of one of the most very busy, asked him to put it in a | self. glass jar on the table, which was | accordingly done.

Pat's Narrow Escape.

During the South African war an Irish trooper on outpost duty one night felt so desperately tired that he thought he would have a five minute nap. Placing his helmet on a rock, he lay down and was soon in a sound steep. Waking suddenly, he mistook his helmet for one of the enemy, drew his sword and dealt it a severe blow.

Perceiving his mistake, the trooper picked up his helmet, which he had cut in two, and gave thanks to heaven that he had taken it off before lying down, "for," he soliloquized, "had my head been inside that it's 10 to 1 a dead man I would have been seeing meself at this moment!"

One Time That the Great Actor Dis-

The great French actor, Coquelin, used to tell with glee the following experience in which he himself played the leading part:

"I was tired out and so made up my mind to leave the theater for a time and go and vegetate in some isolated country place. I went right into the center of France and soon found myself nicely settled in a homely yet comfortable commercial hotel. I did not want to be known, so I signed myself in the book, 'Frederick Febvre, traveler for wines, spirits, etc.'

"At the table d'hote I soon became acquainted with those staying at the hotel. My neighbor on the right traveled for a firm which specialized in table delicacies, my neighbor on the left was in the oils, another for a novelty in babies' feeding bottles. These gentlemen soon became known to me, and I was myself asked the name of the house for which I traveled.

"Now, being a new hand at the game, as I said I was, I was immeas to the value and kinds of rine I ought to go in for. "During dinner all went pleasantly. A certain little traveler, full of life and conceit, commenced to give us a few recitations and imitations, some of them fairly clever, I must confess. He was applauded tremendously, and, filled up with confidence and wine, he said: "'Now I am going to imitate a few celebrated actors,' etc. He imitated Mounet-Sully as Hamlet, he imitated Sarah Bernhardt in 'La Tosca' and then finished by saying: 'I am now going to give you an imitation of Coquelin. Pay great attention, and you will all swear that it is Coquelin himself.'

"He gave us this imitation, and when he had finished I rose and
