There is always more or less skepticism attached to every new and untried project. This seems to Begin Cruize be the case relative to the munust installed. There is one criterion hat we might go by that would ndicate the success of the Spur plant in the event the people give t the proper patronage. The first thing that the people must bear in mind is, "That this new light plant is the property of the people." There is another important factor that the people might observe, "When you patronize the Spur Municipal Light Plant, you are patronizing your own instituion." There is another thing worth considering. "All profits that are derived in the manufacture of electricity by the municipal light plant when patronized by the people, are turned back into the treasury of the city and in after years will relieve the people of taxes, or promote future improvements needed in our city."

> Then considering these facts, we might say that the city light plant will be a success. If the people cess? We have had individuals who are people today who would like in other towns not as good as Spur that are making god profits for

Chapter XV

THE DAY OF RECKONING Tarzan came up just in time to see the secretary run and leap over bank to escape the tiger which was pursuing him, then to see the tiger make the same leap. He swung himself quickly down from the tree and hastened toward the spot where he knew the secretary had met his fate.

The body of the secretary was not there. Scattered all about, however, were his torn clothes. Tarzan searched through them but he could find nothing of what he was looking for. Gradually he began to realize that his enemy, Black John, had the papers which he was seek-ing. As he got the thought he heard it and responded, too.

Tarzan did not wait for them to assemble. He cupped his hands and called in the jungle guttural, "Find this man—find this Black John—for Tarzan!

Even the cat tribe snarled back its answer. At once the whole jungle was on the search. Suddenly Bobby caught sight of what he, too, was looking for. "Tarzan!" he shouted. "Tarzan!" Tarzan dropped down quickly beside him. "Tarzan," cried Bobby excitedly, "Black John came into the camp! He has Mary! Come quick to the camp—pick up the trail!"

Aroused beyond measure Tarzan swung the boy up on his shoulder and was off like a flash. The lion and the leopard, the elephant and the tiger, all the denizens of the jungle were scouring the jungle fastness, now, as Tarzan encouraged them. A word from him seemed to redouble their zeal.

Hurry as he might Tarzan could not penetrate the jungle fastness with the speed of the big cats. They had quickly outdistanced him on his mission and as there were many of the of the big cats. them they literally covered the which was worse. There was another sound coming from the jungle and it was not of the animals. This was human. Greystoke rose hopefully but weakly on his elbow and called, "Tarzan!"

Mary seemed to rouse from her She looked around. There, sure enough, was Tarzan—and Bobby! She called, stretched out her arms to him.

A moment and Tarzan had gathered the girl into his protecting embrace, while Bobby tried excitedly to tell her how he had found Tarzan and help.

A long low wail as of a gigantic raised his head and uttered his cat seemed to swell out from the jungle cry. Far and wide it echoed jungle—and a wild cry for help of a As always Tantor was the first to man. Tarzan did not need to pichear and answer it. But the others ture to himself the drama that was heard it and responded, too.

Tarzan did not wait for them to from the infuriated cat, now joined by others of his tribe. With a wild yell and an imprecation on his lips Black John sank down as the largest of the cats leaped. A moment later and the snarling tribe were the blackest heart in the darkest of the jungle.

Tarzan merely said, "Black John is dead!" It was just one of the commonplaces of his life. Mary covered her eyes and Tarzan picked her up gently carrying her over by Greystoke.

"You are wonderful!" Greystolie exclaimed for once showing quite un-English enthusiasm. "No further proof is needed that you are he whom I sought. Now let us get out as soon as we can. I feel-better." Mary nodded as Tarzan looked at Tarzan merely smiled. "Our friends still guard us," he reassured. One of the big cats had shown an instinct even keener than the rest—stoke was enjoying himself immensely. As for Greystoke he was quick instinct had set him right.

Mary was thinking rapidly. Hers was an understanding heart. Greystoke started to protest—then stopped. He had seen enough to realize that it would be useless to argue with this remarkable man. Instead, he watched and listened.

Quickly with a smile Mary raised she said simply, "I will! We'll send Bobby back with Lord Greystoke, for he is young, but for us—" She paused. There were unwritable valuese in the course volumes in that pause.

Tarzan overwhelmed with joy eached out his arm and drew her closely to him.

"Perhaps," said Greystoke slowly as he spoke to Tarzan, "you have chosen wisely. Who can tell? But first come to the yacht. There the captain can make the girl yours, really yours."

Tarzan heard, but doubtfully. It was plainly written on his face that he thought Mary was his already. But he hesitated as he saw her face until Mary nodded to him that it was all right.

As the sun sank that night Tarzan stood with Mary upon the lookout hill one arm about her while with the other he waved at the Greystoke yacht bearing Greystoke and Bobby back to civilization. Smaller and smaller the boat faded in the gloaming until finally Tarzan turned and he other arm also encircled Mary. In both their hearts they knew they had exchanged civilization for happiness in the sight of the God of nature.
