MONARCHS OF THE AIR.

This vulture has been watched by the hour through powerful telescopes and never once seen to give so much as a single flap with his

For a very long time the common explanation of soaring flight was that soaring birds like the vulture took advantage of air currents. It is a fact that some birds like the albatross need a breeze to enable them to sail through the air, but there are others, such as the frigate or man-of-war bird, which can rise in the calm and float all day without a motion of their broad pinions.

The wings of the frigate bird have an expanse of ten to twelve feet, and it can fly at any pace up to 100 miles an hour and can remain for a week on the wing without

The albatross of the southern hemisphere has been known to follow a sailing ship for a fortnight at a time, apparently never resting. Its wing expanse is greater than that of the condor, one bird that was shot off the Cape of Good Hope measuring seventeen and a half feet from wing tip to wing tip.

From these figures it might be gathered that the larger the wing expanse of any particular bird the greater its powers of flight. Yet the powers of flight in various birds are not by any means proportionate

The stork, for instance, can fly magnificently. On its annual migration it covers two to three thousand miles and will cross the Mediterranean with the greatest case. as much as the pigeon, yet in proportion to its weight has only half as much wing surface.
