Highest "Noncom" Is Always a Most Important Cog in Military Organization.

The first sergeant always has been one of the most important men in the United States army, and he is getting more important all the time, according to the Detroit News. The increase of the infantry company to 250 men has multiplied his labors and his tribulations.

The first sergeant is the buffer between the enlisted men and the company officers. He is himself an enlisted man, but often appropriates an autocratic authority that even the captain would hesitate to assert, He is guide, philosopher and friend to everyone in the company. Practically everything of a military nature that originates in the organization must pass through his hands. and in many matters his is the final

The soldiers go to the first sergeant, not as an enlisted man to an officer, but as man to man. They always have the privilege of taking up important matters with the company commander or one of the other officers, but when the first sergeant is a competent man this privilege is not exercised very often.

A good first sergeant nearly always means a good company, and a poor one the reverse. This, as a general proposition, holds true regardless of the merits of the company commander. For instance, a good captain and a bad first sergeant may result in a bad company, while a bad captain and a good first sergeant may work the other way.
