Keeping Them from the Trap. A gentleman living in a suburban town near New York not long ago found himself much annoyed by a family of mice who lived behind walls of his room, and had cut a door through for their own use. Not only did their scampering about and their gnawing disturb his sleep, but they nibbled holes in his clothes, made free with his provisions, visited the canary in its cage and ate up its seed, and in many ways made themselves

At last he bethought him of a trap, which he at once procured and placed near the mouse door. The first night he caught a mouse, the second another, and so it went on till he had disposed of five of the enemy. Then several days passed without his catch ing any, though he still heard them frollicking within the walls.

He examined the mouse door in his baseboard, and to his surprise found it tightly closed. Being curious about this he pulled the filling out-with difficulty; for it was put in to stayand found it to consist of bits of plaster and other rubbish. He left the hole open, but the next night it was
