The Irish Language.

The Irish language still lingers in the Bahamas among the mixed descendants of the Hibernian slaves banished by Cromwell to the West Indies. One can occasionally hear, it is said, black sailors in the London docks who cannot speak a word of English, talking Irish to the old applewomen whom they meet, and thus making themselves intelligible without a knowledge of the Saxon tongue.

"I shall never forget that journey. It was an awful experience. I felt as if I were being frozen to death and being roasted alive alternately Outside the cars the temperature was 35 degrees below zero. Inside the mercury stood at 77, a difference of 112 degrees Fahrenheit.

"Inside it was so hot that even the muzhiks, who are fond of roasting themselves, gave signs of discomfort. The heat came from a large iron stove, which the attendants kept feeding with birch firewood. As for myself, I was melted; The perspiration poured out of every pore of my skin. times occurred on such occasions. The cold guests which forced themselves in when the door was opened immediately condensed and crystallized the vapor so that we had a miniature shower of snow in the carriage. "A few of the passengers appeared really to enjoy this alternate freezing and roasting. They crowded about the stove. Master of Balliol College. A few years ago, Professor Jowett was one of those who extended an invitation to the extension students to meet at Oxford. Desiring to find lodgings for some of them at Balliol college, he suggested to the dons that it would be a graceful thing for them to vacate their rooms for a fortnight, and allow him to assign their rooms to his visitors. The dons demurred. The master, however, had sole control of the chapel services and the buttery. The former he lengthened very considerably, and the resources of the latter were reduced to the lowest ebb. This policy had the desired effect, and the dons began to leave town for a holiday. As the last of them disappeared in the direction of the railway station. weighed down with hand-luggage. the master rubbed his hands, and said: "This kind goeth not out but There is something in the dead anguages which causes those who make them their study to have, as the Scotch say, "A quid conceit of thirsels." Of Whewell, it was said that "science was his forte and omniscience his foible." Professor Donaldson used modestly to admit that he knew nothing of botany; but the whole circle of the science was, with this exception, supposed to be at his fingers' end. What I do not know," says Jowett, (for though somebody said it for him, it comes to the same thing) "is not knowledge." The last utterance of a well known classical authority is said to be as follows: "Tennyson dead, Browning oead, Jowett dead; I feel almost alone."-Argonaut.

IN NOISY NAPLES.

A City in Which There is Little Peace and the Donkey an Old Offender. It is a noisy city, not with the heavy rumble of Broadway, but the clatter of light vehicles and the patter of little feet of horses and donkeys. The shout oh-a-a-a-a of drivers rings through the streets like the cessantly cracking whips sound like the Fourth of July. Everybody talks loud on a high key as though in a war of words. Venders hawn their wares with a yell, which, though in musical tones, is piercing.

noise is in the barber's shop, where a half dozen men work in solemn silence, not discussing weather, politics or scandal with their victims. It seemed unnatural and gruesome. have heard only one hand-organ, and that was an antique; probably the others have emigrated to America. One unusual noise will attract attention. I exploded one of my dynamite sneezes on the Toledo one day. It made a sensation in the midst o the busy traffic, perhaps because there has been so much said about anarchist bombs lately. My cabman jumped a little but quickly recovered himself and said: "Vostra salute, signore." Sometimes the church bell rings violently as though for a fire; one looks for the engines, but it is only for a funeral, and the white-clothed bearers, with holes cut for eyes in their masks, come round a corner with the painted or embroidered catafalque on their shoulders, preceded by the priests and acolytes. Above all noises the donkey's frequent bray prevails. I can not get used to it. It always sounds like something else. In church one Sunday I thought I heard an old well windlass groaning and squeaking with its roughly turning axle. Poor, dear little donkeys, if they get any comfort out of their braying they are welcome to it, for it is about all the comfort they have. When one sees a little fellow, the size of a calf, pulling a good load of furniture and a big two-wheeled cart, or nine heavy trunks and two men, or another with paniers and a boy twisting its tail, it seems like a very human voice of patient wee and rebuke that comes out in that bray. I do not see what Naples could do without those nimble little feet, trotting up and down her hills. The donkey's foot is spoons as a token of gratitude per-
