LONG AGO.

BY R. J. HAY.

Though for the most part a lovely heaven island, the island of Long Ago is a little island of the sea, The heart's last home, a little island of the sea.

Ye toil'd through desert sands to reach With footsteps slow, Poor yesterday's—immortal glances
In Long Ago.

The world is dark backward on thoughts of yesternight, Sweet memories, angels to our feet turning,
Leaves Long Ago.

We climb, children to our knees are climbing,
To seek in back birds and brooks are singing
In Long Ago.

Hands clasp'd, tears shed, and song are Beloved ones, Whispering, through the angel-gates of air,
In Long Ago!

George Geddes on Cotton Sheep.

[From the N. Y. Tribune.]

England has cotton-producing sheep the "pivot upon which her agriculture revolves, and the means of making her fields more productive in wheat than even the prairie of the West. The possession by England of the long-wooled races of sheep was the foundation of her manufacturing supremacy; the worsted manufacturer's supply by this wool, far surpassing that of clothing-wool, and having opened the way for the manufacture of cotton. More than half the wool of England, whose annual product is about 250,000,000 pounds, is used for combing purposes, no wool of the Merino race being produced there. England has one sheep to one and three-quarters of acres of land, while Ohio and Vermont (in 1885) had one to four and three-quarters, and New York one to six and a half acres. England has pushed the rearing of sheep to produce the most mutton on a given space of land and in the shortest time, and she has done so at a smaller cost than any other country. The sheep is at once the manufacturer of the mutton that produces the grain and sustains the fertility of a soil that has been cropped for the manufacture of wool, and at the same time supplies the looms with the material to sustain that colossal system of manufacturing that has enriched the commercial and manufacturing center of the world.

I find in an old work on agriculture 23 different breeds or families of sheep described as existing in England at the beginning of the century. Nine of these families are classed as "long wools," the 12 as short and fine. The average weight of the fleeces of each of these families gives, and their general improvements have been made in the sheep of England, perhaps quite as much as in the fine wools of the United States. For my purposes it is not necessary that I should give any account of English breeds beyond those that I suppose, and are probably introduced into this country.

THE LEICESTER

is perhaps the most widely extended and numerous breed of sheep in England; they are described by the author as being of a size sheep are without horns, with white faces and legs; the head small and clean; the eye bright; the neck and shoulders square and deep; the back straight, with deep carcases; hindquarters tapering toward the tail and somewhat deficient when compared with the Cotswold sheep.
The wool is a valuable part of the fleece, and is remarkable for the proportion of outside fat it carries.
They are not considered so highly as the other large breeds, and require shelter and good keep. The ewes are neither very prolific nor good mothers, and the young lambs require great attention. Early maturity and aptitude for fattening are the principal characteristics of the breed; a large proportion of the wethers, finding their way to market at 12 or fifteen months old, and weighing from 80 to 100 pounds each at two years old; they average 120 to 150 pounds each. The wool is a valuable part of the production of the fleece, the fleece averaging 7 pounds each.

It was in the improvement and perfecting of this breed of sheep that the industry of England, in Leicester, so much distinguished himself. He not only selected his breeders from Leicester flocks, but their direct descendants by indiscriminate crossing with other breeds.

The occasional introduction of a little Cotswold blood into a Leicester flock has the effect of improving both the constitution of the animal and also the hindquarters, in which the Leicester is somewhat defective.

Practical Shepherd.

The flock of this famous sheep is said to be very much liked by the laboring population of England.
The great thickness of fat on the outside of the ribs, is not by them objected to, as it furnishes the material for fattening mutton, and the food cooked in combination with it
