THE TIEBORNE TRIAL. LADY DROUPE AND MR. GOSFORD IN THE WITNESS BOX. LONDON, June 25.

The interest felt in the Tieborne case, after languishing for some weeks, has suddenly revived, and yesterday, the forty-fourth day of the trial, it became intense and almost painful. During the two previous days the court had been occupied with the testimony of Mr. Gosford, the man who knew Roger Tieborne most perfectly, his intimate counsellor and confidential agent, his attorney to whom he gave the famous "sealed packet."

CHARITON, Nov., 1852. If it be true that my cousin, Kate Doughty, should prove to be an envious woman, she would be a disgrace to her name.

And it must be kept in mind that when pressed to say what this meant he swore that he had seduced his cousin in July or August, 1852, that the seduction took place one day when they had been walking alone together, and that the scene of the crime was a mill near the village. Now Mr. Gosford in his testimony gave the whole story of the "sealed packet," and his testimony was sufficient of itself to convict "the defendant."

Roger arrived in England from Waterford somewhere about the 15th of October, and asked me to meet him at Bath. He came down to Tieborne on Christmas Eve, 1851. I was staying in the house at that time with my wife. I renewed my conversations with him, I recollect them. In the first place they had reference to the extreme slight he had in finding Miss Doughty's feelings just the same as they were six months before. During the whole of six months he had had the idea that one or the other might have superseded him, and his discussion led to his leaving the paper with me. In a long conversation I had with him he contemplated the great difficulty with regard to Lady Doughty and his father, and it was then and there he wrote that paper that has been so much talked about. I think he was induced to do this by recollection of what Sir Edward Doughty had done in a somewhat analogous position. Sir Edward had made a vow when his son was ill that if the child recovered he would build a church at Poole. The child recovered, and the church was built, and it stands there to this day.

the Blessed Virgin." A little lower down he wrote: "I also intend to rebuild the house at Tieborne." That was an old idea of his. By the Jury—His name was signed. He put it formally, "Signed, R. C. Tieborne." That was signed by himself, and the seal remained unbroken till I destroyed it. And Mr. Gosford added that this was the only document that Roger Tieborne ever left with him, and is the most solemn manner he declared that not only was there not in this document any allusion to the seduction or pregnancy of Miss Doughty, but that he, who knew Roger Tieborne better than almost any other person, was as certain that "the defendant" was not Roger Tieborne as he was of his own existence. It should be added that he supported this declaration with a perfectly overwhelming mass of proof; so that, in any other country than England, I think, the prosecution would have been content to rest their case on his evidence alone. And, indeed, the judges and the jury, after they had heard Mr. Gosford, showed by many plain signs that their minds were made up, and that it would be a work of supererogation to examine another witness.

Seldom has there been a more pathetic scene than that in the court yesterday, when this lady told the story of her first romance and her first love. She is now the happy wife of a noble gentleman and the mother of his children. He stood by her side, while she related to the gray haired judges and the attentive jurymen the sad and simple story of her girlish affection and her maiden love; so that she might vindicate her fair fame from the stain that the man who pretends to be her cousin and to have been her lover had cast upon it, and I fancy that no one who heard her had the slightest doubt of her truthfulness. It is all up with the defendant, I should say, and, although it is impossible to predict what may yet happen in the course of this extraordinary trial, it seems equally impossible that he can escape conviction.

AN ECCENTRIC KING.

THE LAST PERFORMANCE OF THE KING OF BAVARIA. The eccentricities of the young King Louis II., of Bavaria, have of late become such that the question whether or not the present representative of the house of Wittelsbach is insane is more anxiously agitated at Munich, and especially at the imperial court at Berlin, than ever before. The former curious freaks of the King have all been forgotten; his expenditure of $6,000,000 for limiting, at his castle of Hohen-schwangon, the hanging gardens of Queen Semiramis; his attempt to build a pyramid like that of King Cheops on the famous Lechfeld, and his numerous flirtations with princesses, whom he fitted most unceremoniously when they had most reason to look for an offer of his heart and hand.

But what which engrosses at the present time the attention of the good burghers of Munich is the singular mania of the young King in regard to the theatrical affairs. It is a well-known fact that King Louis II. looks upon the theater as the prime source of popular education; that he considers Friedrich von Schiller and Moliere the two dramatists without whom the stage could never have acquired its present eminence; and that he, the Wittelsbach ruler himself, has written a play, which he not only, as might be expected, values very highly, but which, in his opinion, is a combination of all that is valuable worthy both in Schiller and Moliere. This wonderful play entitled "The Fan of the Marchioness" and there exists but a single manuscript copy of it—it contains three acts, and is written in Alexandrine verses. That is all that is known about it. No profane critic has as yet cast his eyes upon it, but one person has seen it performed on the stage, and yet the whole company of the Royal Theater at Munich know it by heart; and the play has, moreover, been performed already upward of a dozen times with scenery and decorations, such as have rarely been bestowed upon the tragedies of the greatest masters.

The explanation of this is a very simple one. King Louis II. is a man of the most retiring character. Most of the time he lives in utter seclusion. The pomp and splendor of royalty are distasteful to him; and, rather than appear at a gala review of the army, he will plead sickness, or, without cause, bury himself in the Alpine retreats of the Bavarian Highlands. The stage is his favorite pastime; but to witness public public performances, when everybody rises from his seat and bows to him as soon as he makes his appearance, is so distasteful to him that for years he has not set foot in his own theater at Munich, except on the occasions which we are about to specify.

About four months ago the actors of the Royal Theater in the above mentioned city received from the manager of the stage the cast of a play entitled "The Fan of the Marchioness," whose author, he said, wished to remain unknown, but which was to be rehearsed immediately. A week afterward the first rehearsal took place, and a few days later the actors and actresses who were to appear in it were startled by the notification that they were to play the piece after midnight on the 3d of March. The most vigorous secrecy was enjoined upon them, and immediate dismissal was threatened to those who should talk about the affair.

Who had ever heard of such a theatrical performance? The actors were all there, and when the curtain went up they vainly looked for an audience. No one was present but a young man dressed in a loose suit of gray, his handsome face adorned with a small well trimmed moustache. The young man was seated in the left proscenium box, and he seemed to follow the performance with rapt attention. The experienced actors did their best to play their parts well. None of them had ever performed under more singular, not to say discouraging circumstances. Applause there was none. The curtain went down and it went up again before a dark and empty house. The only spectator present was to all appearances highly interested, but not even once did he clap his hands.

Finally, just as the neighboring clock of St. Catharine's Church struck four, the play was over, and the actors went home. This singular performance has been repeated since then a dozen times. The actors are almost in a state of revolt, for it seems unnatural for them to no audience without marks of applause or disapproval simply before one young man, who, if he wears a crown, profits by his royal prerogatives in a very curious manner.—[Vienna Press.
