In introducing the main subject the revernel decturer said he knew of no better way to treat it than by taking the prominent characters of the different ages antecedent to the birth of Christ, and considering them and the time in which they lived. To this end he divided his ages into periods of 1000 years each. Speaking of the creation he said the arts and aciences were unknown; subristence was derived from what nature furnished in its rudeness. In process of the part had and Cain and agriculture began to develop. It was the rude agriculture of the earlier time, when sticks were used for plows, brambles for harrows. The virtue of sacrifice was not then known; domestic affection not understood; there was no sense of mutual accountability, and people roamed where they pleased.
