hort but Spley Experience

Last Saturday eventur, three young gens tremen employed in business houses of this city drove out to the Leon for a flunday fish and hunt. They are all 'city chaps," and pather green, of course, about hunting, fishing, camping out and other rural sports. Reaching the Leon, they made down their bed upon the banks of that staganat stream and after mistaking a couple of owls for a brace of panthers, and a pack of wolves away over the hills for a band of Indians right on them—after swearing that the mosquitoes were as big as turkey gobblers, and magnifying all the uniasual sounds of a frog pond into terrible terrors of overy imaginable shape, they went to sleep. Tired nature demanded restoration, and they could no longer fight off her influence. Nor could all the foll agencies that worked on their innocent imaginations do it. They went to sleep. But the sleep was evidently not very sweet and healthy, at least for one of the party, for his mind would be disturbed by awful droams. In one of these droams, he saw a member of the party stroll off toward a locality where a band of Comanchos were supponed to be in waiting, ready to gobble them all up. This would not do, and so he bravely resolved, though at the risk of his life, to run to the resone of his straying friend. Up he sprang from his couch of, humber and dashed off, but did not go very far. A vacancy, and them a splach, for he had gone over an emankment and latto a deep pond of the Leon. The dilemma was a serious one, for at first, though aroused as he passed through space over the embankment to the was still dreaming until he went down overhead into the deep water with all his Sunday clothes on. He managed to 'some up," however, and oried for help. He could swim a little, and with the aid-of his friends was fished out just in time to save his legs from the open mouth of an approaching alligator. A fire was built and the young man spent the remainder of the night drying his apparel and fighting off mosquitoce.

The next morning the party went out for a hunt, as the fish wouldn't bite at hooks baited with chewing tobacco and stumps of cigars. They thought that as this was good enough for them, the catish wouldn't be too fastisteous to bite at it. But the fish didn't seem to "hanker after the tertacker." Hunting for some time, one of the sports saw a jack rabbit, but the nimble creature had laid his long cars straight down on his back, and was away ahead of the ticket. Being of an energetic turn, however, and having never been known to give say, this Nimred designed to chase the hare. So be threw down his gun, and started off. The rabbit would stop occasionally to look at his parsmer, and then go on, while the pursuer wasted all his shot throwing it at the coveted game. To be sure, the chase ended in the young man's disappointment, and, more, in the loss of his gun, for the weeds and brush looked the same everywhere, and before he found his way back to camp a heavy rain had set in and obliterated all his tracks, discensibing him from trailing back to where he had thrown down the gun. The rain poured down, and continued to pour, until the three head thrown down the gun. The rain poured down, and continued to pour, until the three head thrown down the gun. A New Indicatry.

Some numbers ago we made mention that a gentleman here was contemplating going into the business of making a liquid scapout of the root of the bear grass or soap weed, which is so common on our prairies. This business is now under way on a small scale, and the liquid, which has been amply protected by patents and copyrights, is now being manufactured by Mr. Eli Cole, of this city. There should some action be taken to prevent the over leading of floats and drays during heavy weather. It seems that about the same weight is given the animals of the local transportation lines to pull when the streets are muddy, as when they are hard and dry. True, the streets should be graded, or at least, one street, from the depot to the chartal portion of the city; but because that is not the case, is no reason why the fleats should be overloaded and stalled in the streets.
