CONGRESS HEARS WILSON

Not in Hundred Years Has Any President Spoken Before Body.

President Wilson Tuesday bridged the gap that for more than a century separated the pilots of public business, the executive and legislative branches of the government.

Standing before the senate and house of representatives in joint session, as no other president had done for more than a hundred years, President Wilson stated simply and tersely what he thought should be done for the welfare of the country, and asked the legislative colleagues, man to man, to keep the pledges of their party.

With a sweep of decision that shattered that precedent the president brushed aside all imaginary boundaries between congress and the executive office and rescued himself, as he expressed it, from that "isolated island of jealous authority."

Congress, somewhat startled the other day when it heard that the president had determined to personally deliver his message on the tariff, had prepared for a testimony of unusual importance and such it was; yet when President Wilson arrived in the midst of the great assemblage, riding through the streets and looking up into the galleries crowded with privileged ticket holders, he seemed, after all, what he said he was, "a human being, trying to cooperate with other human beings in a common service."

When the much heralded incident was over, congress seemed pleased and the president was delighted. He expressed himself as impressed with the dignity of the occasion and some of his confidants later declared that he left the capitol greatly relieved to think after all that his "precedent smashing had not been such a cataclysmic thing as some older heads had predicted."

The president's visit to the capitol was brief, lasting about a quarter of an hour. He started on his mission at 12:45 o'clock. No one except a secret service man accompanied him. He rode in a white chauffeur-driven car. At 12:54 he reached Speaker Clarke's room, where a joint committee of senators and representatives welcomed him.

They were Senators Kern, Bacon, and Gallinger, and Representatives Underwood, Palmer and Mann. The committee immediately started for the door of the house chamber, the president on Senator Bacon's right.

At two minutes before 1 o'clock the president entered the chamber, Members of the senate and house arising as Speaker Clark brought down the gavel. From the floor and galleries distinguished guests looked on at the scene. Ambassadors from many lands were in the audience, members of the cabinet were there, and all the people who possibly could get in were present.

President Wilson, escorted by Senator Bacon, bowed acknowledgment to the applause and mounted the speaker's stand to the journal clerk's desk, directly in front of the speaker. When he smiled, as he began to speak, the president told his hearers why he had come. He said he was glad to verify for himself the impression that the president of the United States was a person. He was speaking in an ordinary tone of voice, just as though he were talking to a senator in his office. The crowded chamber became hushed.

As the president proceeded with his preliminary statement, averring that he was not a mere department of government, but a human being who came to speak naturally with his fellow men, the interest was tense.

"After this pleasant experience," the president declared, "I shall feel quite normal in all our dealings with one another."

As these words fell from the president's lips the house and senate applauded. Then the gallery joined in. Mrs. Wilson and the president's daughters and other relatives joined from the executive gallery. Ambassador Bryce of England looked on with evident interest. So did Ambassador Jusserand of France, and the representatives from other nations. Where a few moments before the event had seemed unusual, almost unreal, it now appeared perfectly adjusted to conditions and not at all dramatic.

The applause subsiding, the president began to read his brief message on the tariff. He spoke slowly and forcefully, and in less than eight minutes he was done. No interruption occurred and he left the stand immediately, while congress applauded.

In the speaker's room President Wilson chatted for a few moments with the members of the committee, and accompanied by Secretary Taft, left the capitol. At 1:18, half an hour after he had left the cabinet meeting, he was at luncheon in the White house preparing for the business of the afternoon.

TO PROTECT "BOB WHITE." Quail Lives on the nests of the Farm and is an Assistant to Farmer.

Harper's Weekly: The bob white has been called the most marvelous engine of destruction ever put together of flesh and blood, for the pests on the farm. He not only devotes his entire time to insects, catching and eating them from 16 to 18 hours a day, but when the insects are gone he subsists upon the seeds of weeds which have ripened in the hand. Occasionally he gets a few grains of wheat that have been left on the ground by the reapers, but he does no damage. In California, valley quarries have been claimed—have at times consumed altogether too much wheat for the good of the farmers, but outside of California this condition does not hold.

One hundred and twenty-nine different weeds have been found to contribute to the quail's bill of fare. To effect this continuous work of the job white means it is claimed that if in Virginia and North Carolina there are four bob whites to every square mile and each bird consumes one ounce of seeds per day, the total destruction of weed seeds from September 1, to April 30, in these alone, will be 1,341 tons.

Besides the 129 species of weed seeds consumed by the quail, there are 142 species of insects destroyed by him. The Colorado potato beetle, cucumber beetle, chinch bug, mosquito, cabbage patch fly, squash beetle, cotton boll weevil, and worm, grass hopper, codling moth, fly, stable fly and other less common insects are his steady prey.

The government is so serious in prohibiting matter in the nature of a lottery going through the mails, it is a wonder it doesn't hold up love letters.
