should check the land they have under acreage reserve to be sure it is not helping spread noxious weeds, R. C. Buckles, chairman of the Sherman County Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committee,

He advises farmers to keep in mind the fact that, under their acreage reserve agreements, they agreed to control noxious weeds on the land put in the acreage reserve. The cost of controlling the noxious weeds must be borne by the farmer.

Buckles points out that the list of weeds designated as "noxous" is compiled by the Texas ASC Committee, and copies of such are available at the County ASC office. Weeds listed locally are: cocklebur, bindweed, thistle, Canadian thistle. and sunflower.

The acreage reserve regulations state that farmers should take such steps as may be prescribed by the county committee to prevent acreage reserve land from becoming a source of spreading the designated noxious weeds.

Buckles suggests that Sherman County farmers who see a noxious weed problem developing on the acreage reserve land call at the county office for advice on what action to take.

'57 Payments Reported Payments to Sherman County farmers under the Soil Bank's 1957 acreage reserve programs amounted to $848.017.84 as of August 5. The payments were made for reductions in acreage wheat. Altogether, 64,585.4 acres of the crops in the county put in this year's acreage reserve program.

Farmers who take part in the acreage reserve program earn certificates which may be redeemed for cash, or the certificates may be redeemed for CCCowned grain if they have been earned for reducing grain acreage. When the certificates are used in exchange for grain, the value of the CCC-owned corn. barey, rye, oats, rice, and grain sorghums stored in the area of production is set at the current support price for the grade, class and location of the grain less 5 per cent. The value of CCC-owned wheat is set at the current support rate.

Sherman County Abstract Co.

Royal Pendleton, Manager

I Am My Brother's Keeper

Accidents like these, involving children at school crossings and playgrounds, are happily getting fewer every year. But accidents that involve two or more motor vehicles are not. We believe there is a unique reason for this —— a reason that lies deep within human nature itself.

Almost every motorist feels a strong personal responsibility for the safety of children. It is instinctive for any man or woman to protect the life of a child even at the risk of personal danger. Most of us are extremely careful when we see a little boy or girl in or near the street.

But tens of thousands of motorists feel no such personal responsibility for their fellow drivers. To the man at the wheel the person in the other car is often an enemy or a fool. He views him with impatience, suspicion and intent hostility. He is ready to cuss him out at the drop of a hat.

If you doubt this, why not check your own behavior at the wheel of a car? Have you never cut past another car too closely for safety because you felt it was hogging the highway and wandering all over the place? Have you never hugged the center line on the road — just because the stubborn driver approaching was doing the same thing? Or committed any number of other impatient and dangerous violations of good traffic manners and safety rules?

These are the things that cause bad accidents.

Safety experts and students of human behavior say we could eliminate the causes of many such accidents merely by thinking of the fellow in the other car as a friendly human being instead of as a fee bent on our own destruction. They remind us that the truly mature person feels a sense of kinship with every other person. They also remind us that when we feel friendly toward someone our acts bear us out. They are friendly, courteous and reasonable, too. And finally, that a courteous action usually begets a courteous response.

For the "safety" of everyone, be a courteous driver. Your thoughts and actions will make you a happy person.

Daddy Needed A Third Arm

Inventions, often the product of accident, are sometimes born in desperation.

That is what happened to Eli Kahn, 5411 N. Clark Street, Chicago, when his wife gave birth to their first baby boy.

After the first month of joy in their new addition, Eli was left alone with Phillip, and in trying to feed and diaper the bouncing bundle that was his frantic son, he discovered was all thumbs.

"Gosh," the befuddled daddy said to himself, "if I only had a third arm!"

Right then and there, an idea was born. You could almost see the electric bulb lighting up inside Eli's head. Somehow, he managed to feed and tend the tot, until his wife arrived to rescue him. The Chicago salesman of steel products barely heard the scolding his wife gave him for trailing dirty diapers over their band-new couch.

He rushed downstairs, and, in the murky light of the basement, began cutting and shaping a piece of steel. When his wife came down to look for him three hours later, Kahn, his face smeared with perspiration and his arms littered with steal shavings, grabbed her up his arms.

"Eureka," was all that he could say. "Eureka," he shouted, "I found it." Impatiently, his wife asked:

Found what?" "Look," he said, as his wife watched, and he took a baby bottle, fastened it to the clamp on his steel contrivance, and showed how it could be maneuvered in any direction for a complete circle, at any angle.

And, that's how an invention was born, "The Third Arm" as Eli and his wife fondly call it, and which they constantly use in feeding the baby. And so, another industry was born, and a salesman was converted into the city's newest manufacturer. In addition, the proud father and his wife have found a multitude of uses for "The Third Arm," including its function as a phone-holder and a mirror-

But, Kahn insist that his son, Phillip, now six months old, is half responsible for the invention of "The Third Arm."
