Time to Do Something About the Weather

Mark Twain once remarked that, although everybody talks a great deal about the weather, no one ever does anything about it. And a nation which has suffered from the weather as much as has the United States could very well take that sage remark to heart.

For we seem to have gotten ourselves into a position where we get our paws caught in a crack no matter which way the weather goes. If we get a long dry spell, our soil blows away and our crops blister and die; if we get heavy rains, we have floods, property damage, and more loss of

If we can't do anything about the weather itself we can at least start making our country weather-proof. And under the New Deal, comes a sharp warning that if we don't do exactly that we shall pay a terrible price.

'Our country is afflicted with earth disease," he tells itself may be at stake. a senate committee. "No individual ever hastened to a faster doom than we are doing today. So far, according to Mr. Cooke, we have hardly made a start toward "doing something." We have built and are building some great flood control dams; but, he warns, if these have to stand by themselves they are doomed to utter uselessness.

The streams they impound will bring down silt, the silt will raise the river bottoms behind the dams, and before we have got over being proud of our engineering prowess our dams will become ineffective.

If Mr. Cooke is correct, it becomes evident that this business of soil and flood control is a more complicated affair than we have been supposing. To stop floods and erosion it may be necessary to go all the way to the headwaters of the little tributory creeks and brooks that feed our great rivers; to keep the water on the land, we should have to do a great many expensive and difficult things.

These things, says Mr. Cooke, would include control of the use of land by farmers, coupled with the erection of a vast number of small run-off dams at the headwaters of Duryea, who instituted these changes, insisted that that was important. Toby was not to have the artificial appearance of a sophisti-cated young woman. She was to be youth itself, radiant and untouched.

Her costumes were selected with this idea in mind. Dozens of boxes were delivered at the studio from one of the most exclusive shops in New York. Toby tried on the dresses and hats, and Durvea eyed them critically, making selections. When they had finished with them the costumes went back to the shop.

To Farmers and Ranchmen: The State Wide Tax Survey greatly misunderstood by the pub-lic. The great purpose of this survey is to gather statistical information and it is not the intention of its sponsors to increase TAXES. The Survey itself has absolutely nothing to do with your taxes.

This survey is not in criticism of present or past Tax Assessors, but the survey is designed to help them in their work. You must remember that any errors found on the Tax Rolls is an accuumlation of the work of officers since the organization of the County. Naturally some errors would come in, ownership would become lost, abstract numbers confused, etc.

The statistics sought will not hurt you. It may be of untold benefit Please give it.

There will shortly be men in the field calling on each farmer and and ranchman, asking questions filling blanks with required information. It is my hope that you will treat these men with due consideration. They will treat you courteously. Please give them the information sought.
