mal failures and in revolution against them, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States were born. At the time of the creation of our great country, one of the leading political lights of England gave us a life expectancy of not more than 50 years. Others have predicted our disintegration from year to year, from decade to decade and from century to century. In a few short years, this country, under the Constitution, which has relatively few amendments, will have survived for 200 years, and it is my prediction that the forecasters of doom, both of this generation and those of the past, will be as disappointed at the end of the 200-year period as each has been in the falsity of their own individual predictions. Man lives by challenge, and it can never be said that this country and our people have failed to have our fair share of challenges. With each, we have grown stronger. Today we are faced with perhaps our greatest challenge. It, too, will be met and dispensed with as have all others to the greater glory of our nation and our people. We must never lose faith in our own country, in our own people and in the philosophy of government written into our Constitution. Much has been said in recent
