NUMBER THIRTY

Paul Crawford is a remarkable man. He can talk engineering for hours, ticking off accurate percentages, flow rates and pressures of famous oil and gas fields without ever checking written reference. He is familiar with every oil recovery technique and knows the production history of virtually all the major domestic reservoirs.

He is also very human, an exceptional quality in most brilliant engineers. He enjoys sharing his knowledge, making him a perfect fit as petroleum engineering professor at Texas A&M. He thrives on studying engineering/economic problems, making him valuable as assistant director of the Texas Petroleum Research Committee.

Crawford is a native of Stamford, West Texas, and was graduated from Haskell High School. He took his chemical engineering degree in 1943 from Texas Tech after service in the U.
