Governor Moody vetoed that item of the general appropriation bil which sought to remunerate farmers in the "regulated cotton zones" for bill which sought to remunerate farmers in the "regulated cotton zones" for expenses incurred in fumigating and sterilizing their cotton and seed in compliance with the quaranthe regulations imposed by the State. A number of West Texas counties, including our neighboring counties of Dawson, Howard, Martin and Midland, were included in this "regulated zone." The occasion for the quarantine was the alleged finding of a few dead pink boll worms in this area. A great hullaballo was raised by State and Federal departments of agriculture immediately after the discovery of the worms. Their warnings of danger were a surid and vociferous as if an invading army were about to enter the State. Some of us dured to say that all this hue and cry was utterly foolishness. Farmers and busniess men protested vehemently, for they felt that a grave injustice was about to be done. The threat to declare a "non-cotton zone" was modified to the extent that only a "regulated zone" was fixed, within which all the cotton and seed were to be fumigrated and sterilized; and to satisfy the people of this section, members and attaches of the State and Federal department of agriculture assured the people that they would be remunerated in due time for all expenses incurred. The people submitted and observed the regulations to the letter and in due time, in the only way open to them, they put in their claims for expenses, but the Gevernor's blue pencil struck the item out on the grounds that such an appropriation would be unconstitutional. He may be technically right. We are not attempting to pass on that phase of the matter. But it is not morally right for the State to require the farmers to incur these expenses, under a promise that they would be remunerated, and then refuse to pay off. Governor Moody has cooked his goose with these West Texas farmers who believe that the only way to be honest is to be honest.—Lynn County News.
