THE CIVIL LEGION

Among the genuinely patriotic organizations of the United States is the Civil Legion, composed of men who served the nation in official civil capacities during the World War. War governors of the several states, members of non-military war boards and commissions, and others who gave their services in the prosecution of necessary war activities at home are eligible for membership. It is the announced desire of the Civil Legion to cooperate closely with the American Legion in all matters pertaining to the national defense. In fact, it is expected that a resolution will be passed by the American Legion at its coming national convention endorsing the Civil Legion and formally accepting this cooperation.

In seeking a closer affiliation with former military men, the Civil Legion declares that it "has never and will not engage in any financial enterprise or adventures of any kind," and that it "seeks no appropriations or contributory gifts."
By keeping alive the patriotic spirit which animated their members during the war, both the American Legion and the Civil Legion may further contribute to the safety of the nation in case another war should unhappily occur. But neither desires to see another war, and both may be depended upon to use every honorable means to prevent such a calamity.
