How a Chinaman Rides a Broncho. Bill Nye.

When a Chinaman does most anything in his own peculiar Oriental style, it is pretty apt to attract attention; but when he gets on a bucking broncho with the cheerful assurance of a man who understands his business and has been conversant with the ways of the broncho for over two thousand years, the great surging mass of humanity ceases to surge, and stands with bated breath and watches the exhibition with unflagging interest.

A Chinaman does not grab the bit of the broncho and yank it around until the noble steed can see thirteen new and peculiar kinds of fireworks, or kick him in the stomach and knock his ribs loose, or Dolores county, was convened for the swear at him till the firmament gets loose and begins to roll together like a scroll, but he does his hair up in an Oriental wad behind and jabs a big hair-pin into it and behind and jabs a big hair-pin into it and smiles, and says something like what a Guinea hen would say if she got excited and tried to repeat one of Bjoernstjerne Bjoernson's poems backward in his native tongue. Then he gets on the wrong side and slides into the saddle, making a re-mark as though something inside of him had broken loose and then the grand dif had broken loose, and then the grand difficulty begins. At first the broncho seems surprised and temporarily rattled intellec-tually, and he stands idly in the glad sunlight and allows his mental equilibrium to wobble back into its place while the Chinaman makes some observations that Sound like the distant harmony of a Han-cock club going home at 2 o'clock a. m., and all talking at one and the same time. By-and-by the broncho shoots athwart the sunny sky like a thing of life, and comes down with all his legs in a cluster like at bunch of asparagus, and with a great deal of force and expression. This movement throws the Chinaman's liver into the northwest corner of the thorax and his upper left hand duodessimo into the middle of the subsequent week, but he don't complain. He opens his mouth and breathes in all the atmosphere that the rest of the universe can spare, and readjusting his shirt-tail so that it will have the correct inclination toward the horizon, he gently tickles the broncho on the starboard quar-ter with the cork sole of his corpulent shoe. This mirth-provoking movement throws the broncho into the wildest hysterics, and for twenty minutes the spec-tators don't see anything very distinctly. The antumn sunlight seems to be mixed up with blonde broncho, and the softened haze of October seems fraught with pale flap is seen to be very much frayed, like an American flag that has snapped in the breeze for thirteen weeks. He finds also that he has telescoped his spinal column and jammed two ribs through the right superior duplex, and he has two or three vertebræ floating about through his system that he don't know what to do with. The casual observer can see that the Chi-naman is a robust ruin, while the broncho is still in a good state of preservation. But the closing scene is still to come. The broncho summons all his latent energy, he asked, looking cautiously around and wetting his hands in a premonitory sort rating atmosphere, he shoots forward with great earnestness and the most reck-'What kind of a fight would you like?" less abandon, and when he once more biasked the barkeeper, eyeing him gloomily. sects the earth's orbit and jabs his feet "Pistol, knife, fist, tooth, anything.
