Crowd Sees Rodeo As Western Filmed

A rodeo in the cattle country al ways collects a crowd. When Colambia's "Law of the Ranger", now showing at the Liberty Theatre, was being filmed on "location" in the hill-bound wilds of California range land near Newhall, the news got out that a rodeo was scheduled. As a consequence, ranchers and punchers from miles around rode in to the site of the picture and found, much to their obvious int erest, that there was something even better than a rodeo going on a "movie" was being made.

As a consequence, according to Spencer Gordon Bennet, director of the picture, starring Bob Allen and Elaine Shepard, there was no scarcity of bona fide atmosphere play-

"The need for a few western act ors as extras did not actually arise until we reached the ramch," said the director. "Had the crowd of genuine cowboys act shown up, drawn by the false news that a rodeo was being held, we would have had to send back to Hollywood for atmosphere players.

"As it was, the punchers who came to watch the shooting were garbed in genuine ranch costume, With a little makeup, and some additions from the 'location' wardrobe, we were able to utilize many of the real cowboys as actors."
