Report from State Representative Jodie Laubenberg on special legislative session

As you have likely heard, the Texas Legislature was out of session for more than 12 hours before the governor called a special session to deal with final fiscal and health care cost containment issues.

At the final days of session, a few major components of the state's approach to meeting the state's budget restrictions are now, the legislature is meeting to finish up these pieces of work.

A major component to balancing the budget is the so called "fiscally neutral" bill. The fiscal matters bill contained many provisions designed to get Texas through this budget cycle. The most notable of these provisions was to do with school finance and administration.

Provisions related to the school districts were cushioned due to the acceptance of stimulus dollars. This session, Texas cannot maintain the same levels of funding for public education because the economy remains in deep recession. Instead, the state Legislature is restructuring school finance formulas and give districts much more flexibility to administer smaller budgets in ways that least impact the classroom.

Health care cost containment and innovation are also necessary to meet the budget's limitations. The Health Care Compact language, which died in the last hours of session, would allow Texas to join other states in an effort to take control of health care regulation and the Medicaid program through the use of federal block grants. Other provisions would save Texas over $400 million in health care costs.

For no more than 30 days, Texas legislators will work on these measures. The budget does make serious cuts to many programs, and this will impact those citizens who benefit from government programs. However, Texas' budget cuts mirror the reductions Texas businesses and the Texas economy also must face. These cuts are necessary and unavoidable because revenue will not quickly increase to the levels of previous years.

Since his initial call, Gov. Perry has added more items for the Legislature to undertake in the special session. These items include congressional redistricting, Texas Windstorm Insurance Association restructuring and legislation relating to public safety, secure communities and the abolishment of sanctuary cities. The Legislature will first complete its work on the budget, school finance and health care costs before moving on to the newer items.

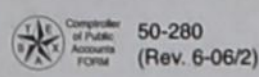

The Legislature is dealing with hard questions at this moment, and debating how to implement the reductions we know are an inevitability. But the bottom line is that government has to adjust its spending in the same way businesses and homes around the state are doing.

I have been grateful to so many of my constituents for their encouragement and their support throughout the session. I hope that through continued discussion, we will be able to get through these tough economic times in the best way possible.

Representative Jodie Laubenberg is serving her fifth term on behalf of District 89.

Texas State Representative Jodi Laubenberg, District 89
