Hollywood Highlights

HOLLYWOOD — What happens to the "Hollywood Canteen" picture is just about what would happen if an automobile manufacturer proposed to turn out a new model, borrowing his rival's best engineers.

The auto people would take a deep breath — and start asking questions. Whose name, for instance, would be on this charity car?

Warner Bros., which made "This Is the Army" for Army Emergency Relief and is turning over all profits minus distribution costs, is the movie company that got stuck with its partly philanthropic idea of "Hollywood Canteen."

It's not the first time Warner Bros. has bumped into Screen Actors Guild's Rule 33, which says actors can't work for less than their usual pay.

But meanwhile the Guild had taken steps to counteract the flock of demands, mostly questionable, for "free" actors.

On the "Canteen" matter, the Guild raised the point that since major studios would not permit their contract people to appear in the film, it would be unfair to ask free-lancers to do so.

And why couldn't Warner's go ahead on its own, using contract stars and free-lancers it could afford to pay full salaries?

Well, they say it wouldn't give a true picture of what the Canteen really is, because while Davis and Garfield and other Warnerites have been active in the service hut, a great many other stars have given generously of their talents.

Boulware is the War Production Board's new operations chief, the man who has to get fighting equipment out in the time and quantity it's needed.

Here's what causes a bottleneck: A manufacturer is asked for so many parts. He says he can't do it because of other contracts or something.

The transmitter, condensed into a compact kit, is designed to save marooned fliers. It is released from a stricken plane before the fliers bail out and it floats by parachute to the water or ground within a few feet of the stranded aviator.

LOSER TAKE ALL By Adelaide Hazeltine

Chapter 22 Trembling Ann made her way back to her room the image of Jerry holding Sarah in his arms photographed forever in her memory.

No, Jerry Lane was without honor both in business and in love. He was not for her.

At last she wept. Not as a child cries for a lost toy but as a woman cries for a lost love.

She couldn't face the guests in the dining room for dinner. She'd have a tray sent up and go early to bed.

As if anywhere in the world she could find an answer to the problem of Terrence House and the misery in her own soul.

She hadn't meant to look in the library. Jerry and Sarah would be gone long ago. But as a murderer is drawn to the scene of the crime her eyes turned involuntarily to the doorway.

The room was dim with indirect lights and in the dimness she saw Jerry. Alone this time and stooping down to the hearth.

As she watched a little blaze flared briefly, etching his profile against the flame.

It was the flame that snapped the last nerve in her body.

"Jerry! The word started to be a gasp and ended in a scream. She ran toward him, her eyes wide with what she feared and what she saw!

He seemed too startled to move. He remained, one knee on the hearth, his fingers holding the corner of a burning paper, a long folded paper very much like the one he pulled from Grand Gussie's hand case.

"Jerry! Stop!" He turned the paper so the flame ran up it. When the fire licked his hand he dropped the charred remains to the grate.

"It . . . that was . . . the will!" Color drained from her face and she sank to the sofa.

"You called it grand larceny at first. That was more polite. Is there anything I can say to make you believe that scrap of paper was burned for your own good?"

"For my own good!" Her voice did break now. "For my own good? So you're a hypocrite, too!"

She began to laugh. Then she began to cry. She tried to stop but every breath brought a new rush of hysterical laughter and a torrent of tears. Jerry spoke to her, put his hands on her shoulders and shook her as he might shake a naughty child.

But she laughed on, was still laughing with tears when he swept her into his arms, strode out of the room and headed for the back wing. She remembered that much, remembered the feel of his arms around her. Then everything went black.

Expensive Diet

ROXBORO, N. C., (AP)—While feeding his mule Waldo Satterfield lost his billfold, containing $100 in currency.

"It . . . it wouldn't matter. It's too late for anything to matter now."

"Of course it does," she said numbly. "Now will you go and leave me alone."

"I could resent that request since it was you who intruded." "A criminal always resents being caught."

"You hate me, don't you?" "No. Hate is too mild," her voice threatened to crack. She added, "For a . . . thief."

"You called it grand larceny at first. That was more polite. Is there anything I can say to make you believe that scrap of paper was burned for your own good?"

Chinese In The Bible

By GEORGE STIMPSON Some authorities say that it is barely possible that the Chinese are referred to in the Bible.

In Isaiah 49:12 the prophet says: "Behold, these shall come from far off, lo, these from the north and from the west; and these from the land of Sinim."

Bible scholars tell us that the correct translation here would be "the land of the Sinites," since the Hebrew original refers to a people rather than a country.

Most authorities question the suggestion that Isaiah was speaking of China, but it is nevertheless a fascinating conjecture that he did so.

The Greek geographer Ptolemy, who lived in the second century A. D., mentioned an Oriental people under the name of Sinal, supposedly the Chinese. "Sinal" as used by Ptolemy and by later Greek and Roman writers may have been a Western corruption of the Chinese Ssin, which occurs in many place names and is the source of Tsing, one of the native names of China.

Both the Arabs and the Syrians, close linguistic kinsmen of the Hebrews, referred to China as "sin" or "tsin."

It is possible that Ptolemy merely adapted this word to his vocabulary. The Septuagint, a Greek translation of the Old Testament made at Alexandria long before Ptolemy's time, translates "Sinal" in Isaiah as "Persians."

There is a tribe of people called "Sina" who live on the foothills of the Hindu-Kush Mountains of Afghanistan.

Despite the similarity in names, it is not believed that Isaiah referred to Mount Sinal or the Wilderness of Sin to the southwest of Palestine and comparatively near.

Nor is it probable that the prophet had in mind "the Sinites," a tribe in near-by Phoenicia mentioned in Genesis 10:17.

At any rate, "Sino," used instead of "Chinese" in such combinations and words as "Sino-Japanese," "Sino-Soviet," "Sino-Russian," "sinology," "sinologist" and "sinologue," is derived from the Greek and Latin "Sinal," and is preferred to "Chino" because it is more euphonious.

STUDENT ORCHESTRA ROCHESTER, N. Y. (U. P.) — During a recent rehearsal of the 115-piece Eastman School of Music Senior Symphony Orchestra, a visitor slipped into the auditorium and listened—for two full hours. When the last strains of the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony died away, the visitor approached Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the School and its orchestra, kissed him on both cheeks in true Continental fashion and exclaimed: "Without hesitation, I say this is the greatest student symphony orchestra in the world." And, coming as it did from Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, that was no small feather for Rochester's musical cap. Koussevitzky was in Rochester as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra which appeared in a concert.
