Jest some thoughts

Longhandle, sweat shirt, electric blanket and overcoat weather is in the making, and if you own none of these, then you are probably freezing to death.

It is typical weather for the jolly old gentleman, but is a little early. This type weather usually arrives after Christmas instead of before.

The only objection we have, and I'm sure thousands of other South Plains residents, is the fact that the cotton crop isn't in yet. We feel a whole lot colder when we look at the rows and rows of frozen cotton, that is likely to either rot in the bolls, or be pulled out by the extra weight of the ice.

It's also Santa Claus weather, and the early snows have seemed to put more people in the Christmas spirit earlier than usual.

The bright lights and decorations are always lovely, as are the many shining trees to be seen through the windows of almost every home.

The ground from the last snow has progressed to the point of where your shoes stick in the mud when you take a step, make a funny little squishing noise, and the first thing you know when you go to take another step, is you are barefooted, and this definitely is not barefoot weather.

As this is being written on Tuesday, we are promised another snow and rain and cold spell Wednesday. We can hardly wait. Such prospects to look forward to.

The friendly humming of the gins has been silenced by old man weather, and it will probably be in the neighborhood of two weeks before they are started up again, then it will be a few more weeks before the harvest can be completed.

As we understand it, even when the ground is dry enough for the machines to move in, the cotton may still be wet in the bolls, so that will require a few more days of drying time.

Well, with such hopeful thoughts, we'd best roll off the page for another week.

No sweat little people! Emra Walling is pretty sure he saw Santa Claus looking over the homes in Ropes last week.

The Ropes Needle Club will have its annual Christmas party at 2:30 Dec. 16 in the home of Mrs. Bob Thomas.

Census bureau to survey nine types of farms

Shortly after the first of January 1972, the Bureau of the Census will be mailing out "type of farm" survey report forms to a selected group of farmers.

There will be nine different survey forms used. One each for cash grain, tobacco, cotton; potatoes, sugar and other specialized field crops, vegetables, fruit, livestock, dairy and poultry.

Each form is designed to collect information pertinent to that particular type of farm enterprise. Each form is designed by sections so that if the answer to the lead question is "no" the farmer may skip to the next section.

The trends shown in the 1969 Census of Agriculture indicate that there is an increasing degree of specialization. The completion of the "type of farm" survey report forms will help obtain a truer and more complete picture of this specialization and may set the pattern for future censuses of agriculture.

Cooking Cabbage

Cabbage should be cooked the shortest time possible and with as little water as necessary, advise Extension foods and nutrition specialists. That's the way to save its high nutritive values.

Ever wonder about the purple dye used for the USDA inspection stamp on the meat you buy? According to Extension foods and nutrition specialists, the grading and inspection shields are stamped in harmless purple vegetable dye, and it need not be removed.

When buying lemons, remember they should have a glossy skin, say Extension foods and nutrition specialists.
