TEA Issues School Performance Report: Two Lubbock High Schools Rated "UNACCEPTABLE"

By Abel Cruz

While the local school district tried to put a positive spin on the story; Lubbock residents should still be concerned that half of Lubbock High Schools received an academically unacceptable rating from the state's top education agency. They are Monterey and Estacado High Schools.

The question is why and why is this being glossed over by the powers that be at the Lubbock Independent School District offices?

LISD Superintendent Wayne Havens told the local media that "We've had a decrease in our unacceptable campuses. We've gone from three to two this year. Never is that going to be a point where we say that's good because you know as well as I do, it's not what we want as a district, and it's not what those campuses want".

And while that is true; it still does not hide the fact that two of Lubbock's 4 high schools received an "academically unacceptable" rating from the Texas Education Agency. And what Havens failed to mention was that in 2007 two of the schools; Dupree and Jackson are elementary schools and the other one: Atkins is a Junior High School.

This year all three of those schools received acceptable ratings.

The ratings are released by the Texas Education Agency each year and are used to gauge how students at all public schools are performing. Here is how the process is described on the Texas Education Agency web site:

"The state accountability system assigns ratings to every campus and district in the Texas public education system each year. In most cases the system assigns one of four rating labels — ranging from lowest to highest — Academically Unacceptable, Academically Acceptable, Recognized, and Exemplary. To determine the rating label, the system evaluates indicators of performance, including assessment results on the state standardized assessment instruments as well as longitudinal completion rates and annual dropout rates. Generally, campuses and districts earn ratings by having performance that meets absolute standards or by demonstrating sufficient improvement toward the standard. In addition to evaluating performance for all students, the performance of individual groups of students is held to the rating criteria. The student groups are defined to be the major ethnic groups and the group of students designated as economically disadvantaged. All of the evaluated groups must meet the criteria for a given rating category in order to earn that label.

There are two sets of procedures within the state accountability system; one that evaluates standard campuses and districts and another that evaluates alternative education campuses and charter operators that primarily serve students identified as at risk of dropping out of school. The indicators and criteria differ between the alternative education accountability (AEA) and standard procedures but the overall designs are similar.

The purpose of the state accountability system is first and foremost to improve student performance. The system sets reasonable standards for adequacy and identifies and publicly recognizes high levels of performance and performance improvement. The system provides information about levels of student performance in each school district and on each campus, and it identifies schools and districts with inadequate performance and provides assistance".

What this means for the two high schools is that administrators and teachers will have to create some kind of remedial program to help students improve on their academic performance in the areas they were deficient in.

In the case of Monterey; one of the student groups was deficient in Math for example so some kind of remedial or improvement program will have to be designed before the next accountability ratings period if the schools have any hope of upgrading its status from unacceptable to even just acceptable.

The TEA uses what they call "guiding principles" in creating and applying their accountability ratings. Among them are "student performance";

"recognition of diversity"; "local responsibility" and the "public's right to know".

Based on the accountability results; 4 distinct analysis groups are used to determine ratings. They are "all students"; "African American"; "Hispanic" and "Economically Disadvantaged".

In an example of how poorly students at Estacado did in Math; in 2007 45% of all students met the math standard; this year only 40% of all students met the standard. In order for a school to be deemed acceptable; they must have reached a 50% standard.

In the area of Science; the minimum standard was 45% but only 42% of all students met the standard.

At Monterey High School; an additional analysis group labeled "white" was added to determine the ratings. In the area of writing; students "did not meet the 70% floor for recognized" according to the TEA.

In the area of diversity; accountability results that at the two high schools; minority students were underperforming in virtually all categories. This is a group; and should not reflect badly on members of either minority group who may very well be over performing in individual study areas.

On the good news side of the aisle; there were some highlights in the report. More schools are rated acceptable than last year and the 3 schools rated unacceptable last year are this year rated academically acceptable.

Here is a list of "exemplary" rated schools for the LISD System:

Guadalupe, Hardwick, Honey, Iles, McWhorter, Murfee, Whiteside and Williams Elementary Schools.

In the "recognized" category; the number of schools increased to 18 in 2008. The following received that rating: Bean, Centennial, Harwell, Haynes, Maedgen, Parsons, Ramirez, Roberts, Rush, Smith, Waters, West-er, Wheelock, Roscoe Wilson and Wolfarth Elementary Schools. Junior High Schools receiving the rating are: Evans, Hutchinson and Irons Middle Schools.

In addition to these public schools; Rise Academy in East Lubbock also received an exemplary rating from the agency.

Time for a National Inquiry?

By José de la Isla

Hispanic Link News Service
WASHINGTON, D.C. — The hate-crime and incident blotter is filling so fast now, it suggests the mean side of our national character is rising. To look away from what is happening could mean something equally telling — a failure to face a problem needing national attention.

The latest entry, on July 19, found two white, teenagers in Shenandoah, Pa., charged with homicide and ethnic intimidation in the beating death of a 25-year-old undocumented immigrant from Mexico. Those charged are just 16 and 17. A third youth is charged with aggravated assault.

In Nashville, a pregnant Mexican woman stopped on a traffic violation July 3 and found to have a pending immigration-violation charge was held in handcuffs and shackles by the sheriff's department as she was in labor prior to giving birth.

In North Carolina, Hispanic leaders received death threats for supporting a bill that would allow some undocumented immigrants the right to attend state colleges. Two of the U.S.-born leaders reported receiving profanity-laced messages and were told to "go back where you came from." Other demeaning remarks included — you guessed it — their Hispanic ethnicity.

In Phoenix, five individuals and Somos América, a Latino community-based coalition, have sued Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio, his department and the county government, in U.S. district court for unlawfully stopping and mistreating Latinos in violation of the U.S. Constitution's Fourth and 14th Amendments, Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and the Arizona Constitution.

Plaintiff Manuel Nieto, Jr., a U.S. citizen, claims he was detained in front of his family's auto-repair shop after police heard him listening to music in Spanish. The two Democratic Party contenders for county attorney, seeking to oppose incumbent Republican Andrew Thomas in November, say some undocumented immigrants were singled out at the expense of overall prosecution of crimes.

Many, many more infamous incidents have received media attention — in Farmers Branch, Texas, in Hazleton, Pa., in Long Island, N.Y., in Pottsville, Iowa. They have played out in virtually every state.

If left uncorrected, this social intolerance will become a part of our national character, just as segregation became part of it.

It gives license to discriminate. And all the while, nice people look on.

The numbers — especially the smaller-scale prejudicial infractions — are corroborated in a 2007 Pew Research Center. Astoundingly, the report found a majority of Hispanics stating that discrimination is a major problem for them.

Nothing like the current dimension has occurred in our country since the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882 when racists threw Chinese workers out of Western towns, driving many to seek refuge in Mexico.

During the 1930s' Depression years, more than half a million "Mexicans," thousands of them with legal papers and thousands more born here, were uprooted and shipped to Mexico like cattle, in trains and trucks.

An unthinking rationalization says it's their fault. They have it coming. They probably entered our country without permission.

Did the 75 undocumented immigrant employees working in the Twin Towers in New York on Sept.

11, 2001, have it coming when they perished along with 3,000 others. Did they deserve to die?

The need today is to reconcile and account, admit and acknowledge what happened and what's driving it. One step in that direction would be to call on all those running for a federal office to commit to conducting a national reconciliation inquiry that identifies what was responsible for the irrational overreaction to the immigration issue. Who are the opportunists and provocateurs?

Church leaders and human-rights institutions should form part of the inquiry to hear from victims of abuse living among us. And we ought to invite those in neighboring countries to come forward with their perspectives. We shouldn't listen only to ourselves anymore.

Voters in November should demand not just a commitment to logical immigration reform but to a national strategy to eliminate policies that encourage predatory practices against our national scapegoats, the most vulnerable among us. We can air out this pestilence with truth.

News Briefs Presidential Candidate's Debates to Follow Traditional Patterns

By any historical standard, one would have to agree that this year's presidential race is anything but ordinary; given that for the first time in history a person other than a white male is vying for the coveted position.

That notwithstanding; it seems that when it comes to presidential candidate's debates; politics is business as usual.

Democratic candidate Barack Obama and Republican hopeful John McCain will meet each other at least 3 times before the November General Election. The debates are scheduled for Sept. 26 in Oxford, Mississippi, Oct. 7 in Nashville, Tenn., and Oct. 15 on Long Island, N.Y.

And although neither candidate has chosen a running mate yet; both campaigns agreed that the Vice Presidential candidates will meet in a debate on Oct. 2 in St. Louis, Missouri.

Republican John McCain had wanted to debate Obama in a town hall meeting style setting; but the Obama campaign turned that idea down. The McCain camp was quick to capitalize on Obama's refusal and issued the following statement to the national media:

"John McCain looks forward to debating Barack Obama as often as possible, but it's disappointing that Sen. Obama has refused his offer to do joint town hall meetings," McCain spokesman Brian Rogers said. "We understand it might be beneath a worldwide celebrity of Barack Obama's magnitude to appear at town hall meetings alongside John McCain and directly answer questions from the American people, but we hope he'll reconsider."

The Obama campaign had issued the following statement to explain why they were against the town hall style forums: "Due to the late date of the two parties' nominating conventions, and the relatively short period between the end of the conventions and the first proposed date, it is likely that the four Commission debates will be the sole series of debates in the fall campaign."

So even though it is an unprecedented year in terms of presidential candidates and historical significance; some things in politics never change.

17 Year Old Dies from Gunshot Wound; Sixteen Year old may face Additional Criminal Charges

Earlier in the day they were stealing guns; a few hours later; one of the young teens lay bleeding from a shot to the head.

At first, Lubbock police were told that the shooting had occurred after a supposed "home invasion" had gone awry. Problem was that the teens involved all lied to Lubbock police in order to protect the fact that the guns had been stolen earlier that morning.

Ryan Austin Ledbetter, 17 died late Monday night at UMC Hospital after being shot at a mobile home in the 100 block of Venita; in west Lubbock.

The shooter; who is not being identified because he is considered a minor was being held at the Lubbock County Jail on a burglary charge. A spokesman for the Lubbock County Sheriff's office; Major Don Carter; told the local AJ that the 16 year old could be facing "manslaughter or criminally negligent homicide charges" if it could be proven that his behavior was reckless or negligent.

At this point the shooting has been ruled accidental.

Barack Obama's recent trip to Europe and the Middle East was quite impressive. He met with key world leaders, providing credibility to his presidential candidacy since the leaders took time to meet with him to discuss key international issues.

Even French President Nicolas Sarkozy said that the French would be delighted if Senator Obama were to be elected U.S. President.

Senator Obama had never had stronger support among American Jews since he clarified his position to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that the United States will continue to be a strong ally of that nation. Senator Obama was shrewd in meeting also with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, Israeli President Shimon Peres, Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Obama also met with King Abdullah II and Queen Rania from Jordan.

The Democratic candidate stated that if he were to become U.S. President, he would help find solutions to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict but that it would take time to resolve. Obama also met with British Prime Minister Gordon Brown.

The images of Senator Obama meeting with key foreign heads of states from the Middle East and Europe did indeed make him look presidential and capable of dealing with foreign issues. But is he done visiting other countries? He has yet to pay similar attention to Latin America.

Barack Obama needs to strengthen his relationship with Latin America heads of states. He cannot afford to ignore the roots of the 50 million Latinos living in the United States. His relationship building with several key Latin American presidents is bound to enhance his image among Latinos living in the United States.

If he does not act quickly, then Senator John McCain will continue to solidify his relationships with Mexico and other key Latin American countries. President George W. Bush did in fact raise his profile among Mexican Americans as Governor of Texas. He continually met with Mexican government officials and in part won the U.S. presidency by obtaining a large percentage of Latino voters.

Senators Obama and McCain must prioritize Latin America — one of this nation's biggest trade partners. They should plan trips to Latin America before the November 2008 general elections. Actions speak louder than words. All voters need to know how, if elected, they plan to treat Latin America.

Historically, the United States has undermined Latin America. The United States did accept that Central America was a "hot spot" during the 1980s and sent billions of dollars in "aid" to fight the threat of Communism there. Once the Cold War ended, the importance of Central America and Latin America on the world stage reduced tremendously.

The United States no longer felt it needed to invest to influence the hearts and minds of Latin Americans. In the 1990s, U.S. aid to Latin America was reduced tremendously. One exception has been Colombia. The United States has invested billions through Plan Colombia — to combat the production of coca leaves, the main ingredient used to make cocaine.

Voters, particularly Hispanic voters, need to know if Latin America will become a priority. The two candidates still have the opportunity to make their case if they want to capture the Latino vote.

How will they handle future trade agreements, immigration issues, foreign investments, and poverty issues that plague Latin America. Both candidates must address these issues if they want to reduce the push factors that force millions of Latin Americans to migrate to the United States.

They don't need to speak fluent Spanish to communicate with Latin American leaders. That's why fully qualified interpreters and translators exist.

The question is will the United States care to pay attention to our Latin American vecinos?

Job Losses Mount, Point to More Economic Sluggishness Ahead

WASHINGTON -- Employers shed jobs in July for the seventh consecutive month and the national unemployment rate rose to 5.7 percent,

The commerce chief said the stimulus package bought time for the economy, but some economists think that it simply delayed a further weakening the Labor Department reported Friday. The losses weren't of the size that signals recession, but analysts think that continued sluggish economic growth lies ahead.

The nation's employers trimmed 51,000 jobs from nonfarm payrolls during the month of July and more than 463,000 jobs cumulatively this year, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The jobless rate bumped up two-tenths of a percentage point during the month, from 5.5 percent, leaving more Americans without jobs.

"Though the decline wasn't huge, it was very broadly based, with only health-care and mining showing anything that could be described as strength. Hours worked per week declined, which is a bad sign for future hiring," Nigel Gault, chief U.S. economist for forecaster Global Insight, observed in a note to investors. As of the latest reading by the Labor Department, 8.8 million Americans were unemployed, a number that's grown by 1.6 million over the last 12 months, and the unemployment rate has risen a full percentage point over that period.

A deeper dig into Friday's numbers paints an even more troubling view of the national employment picture. The number of people working part time for economic reasons rose by 308,000 to 5.7 million. It's risen by 1.4 million over the past 12 months. This measure includes people who said they'd like to work full time but that their hours had been cut back or they were unable to find full-time jobs.

Also, the number of marginally attached workers -- those who want to work but aren't counted as unemployed because they didn't look for work in the prior four weeks -- has risen by 1.6 million over the last 12 months.

Many economists expect a protracted period of sluggish economic growth below the potential of the U.S. economy, but not recession.

"If we look at the job losses we had during the time people are calling a mild recession - which was 2001 - we were losing about 180,000 jobs a month at that time. So clearly this is a different degree," Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in an interview with McClatchy Newspapers. He added, "We don't like to see job losses. Obviously 51,000 is disappointing."

The stimulus package passed by Congress and signed by President Bush earlier this year, which included tax rebates for more than 100 million Americans, has pushed the economy forward despite strong headwinds, Gutierrez said. The Commerce Department reported Thursday that the U.S. economy grew 1.9 percent from April through June, double the rate of the previous three months.

rooted in the housing crisis and the banks' credit crunch.

"What we're seeing is a mild recession interrupted here by a rebate program," said David Wyss, chief economist for the rating agency Standard & Poor's in New York. "Once they (consumers) finish spending these checks, we'll head down again."

Thursday's growth data suggested that business spending is likely to pick up later this year, and Wyss thinks that might help make growth during the July through September period stronger than in the second quarter.

But by the fourth quarter, he thinks, growth could turn negative, as it did in the last three months of 2007.

Congress already is debating a second stimulus plan. House Financial Services Committee Chairman Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., issued a statement Friday calling for one, noting sarcastically that it's "a sign of how troubled our economy is that some analysts are greeting the seventh straight month of job losses and an increase in the unemployment rate to 5.7 percent as relatively good news."

Federal and state spending can help spark growth, he said. "This stimulus should include increases in the federal share of Medicaid, significantly increase funding for home energy assistance and food stamps, and other measures which will provide badly needed stimulus for our economy and help state and local governments and individuals improve the quality of their lives," Frank said. He also called for aid to state and local governments to improve infrastructure, such as bridges.

The Bush administration hasn't signed on to any call for a second stimulus plan, saying that the effects of the first one are still playing out.

The wild card in all economic forecasts is oil prices. Their rise slowed the U.S. and global economies and sparked inflation. Their recent partial retreat has eased pressure on the Federal Reserve and foreign central banks to raise interest rates to curb inflation. The Fed is widely expected to stand pat when it meets Tuesday to weigh rates.

"The Fed is stuck on hold, trapped between a weak economy on one side and high headline inflation on the other," said Gault, of Global Insight.

If oil prices slide back to the $100 a barrel range, it would certainly ease inflation pressures and probably would boost consumer confidence. That's no small matter, because consumption drives about 70 percent of U.S. economic activity.

"What could rescue us is oil prices getting back down under $100," said Wyss, who thought that unlikely but not impossible.

Un controvertido programa que permite el acceso de los camiones mexicanos a carreteras estadounidenses cercanas a la frontera ha sido ampliado a dos años, a pesar de numerosos intentos del Congreso por impedirlo.

El llamado Proyecto Muestra de Cruce Transfronterizo Camionero fue criticado por el Congreso en enero y los legisladores trataron de impedir, sin éxito, que el gobierno invirtiera dinero para establecerlo.

El cruce de los camiones fue contemplado en el Tratado de Libre Comercio de Norteamérica, firmado en 1994.

El director de la Administración Federal de Seguridad en los Transportes Motorizados, John H. Hill, dijo que ha habido poca participación en el programa. Hasta ahora, solamente 10 empresas estadounidenses han elegido participar, operando 55 camiones en México.

Apenas 27 empresas mexicanas lo han hecho también, con 107 camiones introducidos a Estados Unidos. El programa permite hasta 500 camiones de 100 empresas mexicanas con acceso irrestricto a los caminos estadounidenses.

"Varias empresas que podrían participar no han estado dispuestas a invertir el tiempo y los recursos necesarios para hacerlo, debido a la incertidumbre en cuanto a la longevidad del proyecto", dijo Hill en un comunicado.

Hill indicó que el proyecto ahorra dinero a los consumidores y reduce el costo de los embarques. Algunas empresas estadounidenses, sin embargo, afirman que el acuerdo lo afecta al permitir que los camiones mexicanos, que pueden operar a menor costo, sigan rutas similares a las suyas.

A algunos también les preocupa que el programa signifique pérdida de empleos en Estados Unidos.

Hill dijo esperar que la ampliación permita calmar los temores de los camioneros y generar un mayor interés en el programa. Sin embargo, algunos legisladores dicen que se mantendrán en pie de lucha constante contra el programa.

El senador Byron Dorgan calificó la ampliación como una "imprudente arrogancia respecto a la ley" por parte del gobierno del presidente George W. Bush.

"Esta disputa se refiere a los esfuerzos del gobierno por permitir que camiones grandes mexicanos ingresen al país, de una forma que creemos pone en riesgo la seguridad en los caminos estadounidenses", dijo Dorgan en una declaración.

"No debemos de permitir que continúe este programa", señaló.

Obama favorece usar petróleo de las reservas

Barack Obama se retractó ayer al afirmar que está a favor de recurrir al petróleo de las reservas estratégicas a fin de rebajar los precios de los combustibles.

El virtual candidato demócrata a la presidencia dijo en un discurso que la estrategia podría ayudar a bajar a corto plazo los precios de la gasolina, que ahora llegan hasta los 4 dólares por galón. Obama se opuso previamente a recurrir al petróleo guardado en la reserva, ubicada en Texas y Luisiana.

El candidato dijo que los retiros anteriores de la reserva "han bajado los precios de la gasolina en sólo dos semanas".

El senador demócrata por Illinois dijo que los políticos han cometido errores a la hora de lidiar con la crisis energética durante tres décadas y que su rival, el republicano John McCain, ha sido "parte de ese fracaso".

Obama alegó que el uso de las reservas es una estrategia a corto plazo para un problema de largo plazo.

"El romper con nuestra adición al petróleo es uno de los desafíos más grandes a los que se enfrentará nuestra generación. Significaría nada menos que una transformación total de nuestra economía", dijo Obama.

"La transformación será costosa, dado el desastre financiero que heredaremos de la actual administración, y requerirá que posponga mos otras prioridades", agregó.

El día de su 47 cumpleaños, Obama lanzó una nueva ofensiva douidenses, según las encuestas.

En el anuncio, que se verá a nivel nacional, Obama acusa contra su rival republicano, mediante un anuncio televisivo sobre el tema de la energía, principal preocupación de los esta-

McCain de haber aceptado fondos para su campaña de parte de las grandes firmas petroleras, en momentos en que los esta-douidenses luchan con los altos precios de la gasolina y el miedo a la recesión.

La semana pasada, Obama señaló también que apoyaría perforaciones limitadas frente a las costas del país en caso necesario, si ello permitiera definir una política energética que promueva vehículos más eficientes y otras fuentes de energía alternativas.

Mientras tanto, los estadounidenses más pobres, incluidos los blancos, prefieren a Obama por encima de McCain, según un sondeo publicado ayer por The Washington Post.

De acuerdo con la encuesta, realizada entre los asalariados estadounidenses más pobres, Obama reúne 58 por ciento de la intención de voto frente a 28 por ciento de McCain.

Entre los negros de esta categoría, 96 por ciento dijo que votará por Obama y 2 por ciento por McCain. Los hispanos más pobres indicaron en un 61 por ciento su preferencia por el demócrata mientras que 22 por ciento se inclinó por su rival. Y entre los blancos Obama obtuvo una ventaja de 10 puntos sobre McCain (47 contra 37 por ciento).

Esto cuestiona la percepción de que Obama tiene dificultades para atraer el voto de la clase obrera blanca.

Bajofondo mixes Latin, rock, hip-hop sounds

Don't call Bajofondo a revisionist tango band anymore or you'll raise the back hairs of its leader, Gustavo Santaolalla. The band, whose name loosely translates to "below the much broader category of Latino pop rock now known as Latin alternative. He has guided and produced the careers of Maldita Vecindad y Los Hijos del Quinto Patio, Caifanes, Molotov, Fobia, surface," is an eight-member ensemble of South American musicians who have created a generational language that fuses Latin alternative rock with the rich musical blends that thrive along the Argentine-Uruguayan border.

"We don't like the label 'electronic tango,'" Santaolalla says in Spanish. "What we do is a mixture of music that draws from the influences along the Rio de la Plata (the river that forms part of the border between Argentina and Uruguay), and tango is a part of that, along with milonga and candombe, but then you have what the rest of the band brings to it that adds elements of rock, electronica and hip-hop."

Explaining what Bajofondo is today has become a mantra for Santaolalla as the band is exploring new pop turf. The group was born as the Bajofondo Tango Club when Argentine Santaolalla and Uruguayan Juan Campodónico conceived an experimental project to explore the tango. Adding contemporary twists that were respectful of the past, the band released its self-titled debut CD in 2002 and won a Latin Grammy for best pop instrumental album.

The album gave tango a charge that integrated live musicians playing acoustic bandoneon, piano and violin with a sonic spectrum of digitized beats and electronica. The sampled voices of tango greats Roberto Goyeneche, Susana Rinaldi and Adriana Varela gave the music an ethereal drama that far surpassed Bajofondo's European counterpart, the Gotan Project, which also fuses tango with rock and rap.

Now Bajofondo, which performs today at the Stern Grove Music Festival in San Francisco, has reached a new plateau with "Mar Dulce" ("Sweet Sea"), its third album. It redefines the collective as a solid, cohesive band seeking to evolve into something new and different.

"We've been playing this music for a while now, and it has taken different turns, and we no longer know what to call it," Santaolalla says by phone from his studio in Los Angeles. "We are trying to do something that expresses the folk music of today by taking the past and putting it into a form that transcends it back to the dance hall."

Santaolalla is a maverick producer known as "the guru of Latin alternative." Through his Surco record label, he re-directed what was called rock en Español in the 1980s into a Cafe Tacuba, Juanes, Julieta Venegas and many others.

Born in Buena Aires in 1951, Santaolalla has been rocking out since he first heard the Beatles as a boy. He started playing guitar at age 5, and by 1967 he was a star in the neophyte Argentine rock band Arco Iris, which played polished hum-and-strum folk rock with electric guitars and featured Santaolalla's vocals. He became a teen idol in Argentina, but it was a politically turbulent time in his country, with the government threatened by a military coup.

"I arrived in the United States in 1978, when the Argentine government was killing and imprisoning people like me - students and musicians who dared to have long hair and sing songs of protest," he says. "Arriving in Los Angeles, I saw how Mexican immigrants were treated, and it reminded me of my country."

He started from scratch in Los Angeles, where Latin pop was reinventing itself. He broke ground with longtime colleague Anibal Kerpel and formed his first band in the States, Wet Picnic. The group started getting gigs and soon signed with Universal, releasing the EP "Balls Up" in 1982. He also released his first solo album, "Santaolalla," which had moderate success but got his name out there.

The studio skills he had honed producing five Arco Iris albums were noticed.

"We were pioneers in rock en Español in Argentina at a time when there were a lot of bands but nobody to produce them," Santaolalla says. "That's when I decided to become a producer."

After his first solo album, homesickness drove him back to Argentina, but his stay was short-lived. He left for Mexico City, where he worked with Maldita Vecindad and Cafe Tacuba, which considers him its fifth member.

By the mid- to late-'90s, he had produced two more solo CDs, "Gas" and "Ronroco," the latter an entrancing ambient album of electro-acoustic textures featuring Santaolalla playing his tiny Andean charango guitar. With its soul and simplicity, "Ronroco" caught Hollywood's ear, paving the way for the next phase of Santaolalla's career: movie soundtracks.

He went on to work on numerous films, including "The Insider," "Amores Perros," "21 Grams" and "The Motorcycle Diaries," picking up Academy Awards for his "Brokeback Mountain" and "Babel" scores.

"The awards are a tremendous honor, but they aren't just about me," Santaolalla says. "They are also shared with all the people who worked with me on these projects."

The get-even ways of 'Mujeres Asesinas'

MEXICO CITY — THINK OF it as "Desperate Housewives" — make that very desperate — with butcher knives, vials of poison and bottles of hydrochloric acid. Or an extremely stressed-out "Lipstick Jungle."

It's the hit Latin American TV series "Mujeres Asesinas" (Women Assassins), a high-gloss revenge fantasy about the fury of women scorned that has become a major TV hit and a minor pop-culture phenomenon in certain Spanish-speaking parts of this hemisphere. Already, it has run through three seasons in Argentina and is gearing up there for a fourth. It also has scored high ratings and strong critical notices in Colombia and Mexico, and seems destined to show up very soon on U.S. television screens.

"Many people from the United States and Latin America ask us every day and every week, 'When is it coming to Peru?' 'When is it coming to Chile?'" said Alex Balassa, one of the show's executive producers with Pedro Torres, at a screening of the Mexican version of the series' penultimate chapter here last week.

The series was originally created by the Pol-ka television and film production company in Argentina. In recent years, innovative shows from Argentina and other Latin American countries, as well as the United States, have made significant inroads into Mexican television, which produces relatively little apart from telenovelas (soap operas) in the way of original prime-time programming.

Loosely adapted from real-life crime stories, "Mujeres Asesinas" follows a fairly simple formula. In Mexico, viewers saw two episodes each week in which women are grievously wronged, usually by a man (father, husband, lover, "john"). Most of the female characters formerly were mild-mannered, long-suffering types. But they are transformed by the abuses they endure into hellions with telltale nicknames such as Patricia "Avenger," Martha "Suffocator" and Margarita "Poisonous."

Each of the two separate hour-long segments (minus time out for commercials hawk-ing cellphones and collagen enhancements) builds to a gruesome climax, in which the crime is reenacted. For the Mexican version, the producers decided to add a new dramatic element by showing the crimes being scrutinized by the "Department of Investigation Specializing in Cases of Women," presumably to assure anxious viewers that justice will be served. Every episode also concludes with a moral coda stating what just deserts were reaped by their homicidal protagonists.

Predictably, "Mujeres Asesinas" has stirred talk in the Latin American media about whether it might incite women to commit more acts of revenge-fueled violence. Advertisements for the show have played up that titillating idea with tag lines such as, "Cuidado! No permitas que tu mujer vea esta nueva serie." (Take care! Don't let your woman see this new series.)

Several of the series actresses have dismissed that idea. "I think one of the values of the series is that it speaks not only of the depth of the female psychology, but rather it speaks . . . [of] the human condition, no?" said Cecilia Suarez, the actress who plays Ana "Corrosiva," an acid-wielding anti-heroine who delivers a brutal paycheck to her control-freak plastic surgeon lover.

Balassa likewise stresses the universality of the show. But he acknowledges that its depiction of the explosive relations between men and women and "the situations and the manner in which things finally end, are very much of the Latin American profile."

"We are a little macho in the known outside her homeland for playing a prostitute in "Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia," Sam Peckinpah's black-humored 1974 cult classic.

The other is the raw, graphic violence. Similar scenes are Latin American world. And this is what is shown in all the chapters," he said.

Of course, tales about women getting mad, then getting even, have played well across all cultures, from the ancient Greek tragedy "Medea" to the 1978 B-movie "I Spit on Your Grave," about a gang-rape victim's bloody revenge. Many of the antics depicted on "Mujeres Asesinas" hardly will be unfamiliar to regular viewers of telenovelas.

Yet two things set "Mujeres Asesinas" apart from its less-sanguine competitors. One is the quality of its leading ladies. The just-concluded premiere Mexican season, which ran on cable station CTC and will be re-shown this fall on free network television here, featured several of the country's best-known actresses, including Verónica Castro, Itatí Cantoral and Isela Vega, best depicted regularly in telenovelas, but seldom with as much Grand Guignol flair. In Mexico, the show was heavily promoted with billboards in which the actresses were photographed in elegant white attire, their hands and clothes splattered with blood.

Male and female fans of "Mujeres Asesinas" from as far away as China and Croatia are busily posting admiring comments about the series, along with their own personal tales of woe, on the show's official Facebook page. "A wounded woman would be capable of everything," one female fan wrote. "I believe that we are all disposed to fight."

"In the end, violence within families or sexual abuse could be in all the world," said Leo Marker, the Mexican series' press director. "It's on all sides, not only in Latin America."
