NOSIN ...

with sadness and heartache... gladness and joy...faith and knowing...fear and uncertain-ity...sunshine and beauty... darkness and storm, . . calm and contentment... In all probability this varietyis to insure our sincere enjoyment for the good days and lovely moments in our lives, that we might be aware of the pictur-esque beauty of a golden sun-set...the warmth of love...the fragrance of a rose... the beauty of sincere friendships...and the touch of God's hand.

People of this community stand with bowed heads and bleeding hearts, as we are aware that our community recently lost some of its warmth and beauty by the sudden deaths of Mrs. Robert O'Hair and Bob Waide, Each had contributed richly to the community's beauty, warmth and friendliness, and had willingly without hesi-tation offered a helping hand to any and all who were in need... These can not easily be erased from our memory... Our loss has been great... The sun has suddenly gone behind a cloud ...

My younger brother and his wife arrived Monday afternoon from Oklahoma to spend a few days visiting us before returning Jacksonville, Arkansas.

The remembrances of childhood good times, like making ice cream with all the neighbors present, and making lemonade for days using the same lemon, how good candy bars used to be, etc, could not be dampened, except for the sud-den news that our older brother is to have surgery in Oklahoma the end of this week or early next week to remove a cancerous growth. Your prayers in his behalf will be appreciated.

CLINTON WILLIAMS

John Tesovnik Attends Violin Workshop

by Mrs. Tom Stansell

John Tesovnik, music specialist, Kern County Superinten-dents of Schools Office, Bakersfield, California, tecently returned from New York, where he attended the first session of the String Instrument Repair Workshop at Hofstra University. Mr. and Mrs. Tesovnik have been guests several weeks in the home of Mrs. Tesovnik's mother, Mrs. Ruth Roebuck, Olton.

Many of the participants of this workshop are professional violin makers and owners of string instrument repair shops, while others present follow this line of work as a hobby. string instrument specialists of the United States and Canada were eligible for attendance at

Simone Sacconi, expert violin repairman of Wurlitzer Music Co., New York City, was an instructor of this workshop. "He, who was schooled and trained in violin making in Rome, Italy, is the Dean of all string instrument repairmen of the world, said Tesovnik.

Another instructor was Irwin Hertel, who owns his own violin shop in Carnegie Hall. He was schooled in Mark Neukerchen, which was the largest violin making school in the world. As it is in East Germany, nothing is known of the present status of this school. Hertel closed his shop during the two weeks' per-iod of the workshop at Hoistra

University. Sacconí, who has eleven workmen aiding him, has repaired over 400 of the 500 famous violins made by the Italian, Antonio Stradivari (1644-1737), who was trained in the art of making violins by Amati. Sacconi went to Cremona, the birthplace of Stradivair, and made a thorough study of the records concerning the work of the great violin maker. Sacconi found the original order Stradivari sent to what is now Yugoslavia for wood to be used in the making of violins. This discovery exploded the theory that Stradivari went to a forest near his home and selected trees by tapping on them, had them cut and used the lumber for material in his making of violins. Wood used in the construction of a violin must be at least ten trees grown on a mountain. Mr. Tesovnik stated, "The secret of Stradivari's success was the quality of wood he used coupled with his genius." During the lifetime of the great violin maker the Venetian merchant ships were the leaders in world commerce, thereby bringing needed materials for the making of violins such as shellac, which a product of insects of India, Shellac is used in varnishes and the formula used by Stradivari in making his varnishes is still undiscovered. Sacconi explained that all the violins of Stradivari were con-structed by the greatest geometric precision following a series circles. The ruler and the protractor were among the most useful tools. The neck and finger board of his violins were shorter than those of the violins made presently because then only three positions in violin playing were used, while now there are seven.

Stradivari's work falls into three periods, Sacconi related, These are the making of violins as he was taught by Amati, his experimental stage, and his Golden Age, when his true gen-ius came to light. It was in this stage that he made the Messiah, his most superb violin, which is so perfect no chisel marks are visible.

Sacconi was asked to secure a Stradivarius for Italy from Hill and Sons, London, the most fanous violin dealers of the world, An Italian named Tarisio obtained all the Stradivari and other fine violins in Italy and personally carried them to other countries. He worked for monasteries or individuals, who owned the instruments and asked for the violins in exchange of his labor. In other instances he traded new inferior violins for used ones made by the masters. It is said that as he walked from Italy to Paris with his first six Stradivari, he slept in vineyards and orchards, but after the sale of the instruments, he rode in a carriage back to his native country. Mr. Tesovnik said 'Italy has never erected a monument to Tarisio, Sacconiand Hertel taught the attendants of the workshop the art of repairing string instruments so skillfully the cracks are invisible. Instruction was given that is contained in no textbook. The Hofstra string quartet played instruments so that the sensitive ear of Sacconi could detect which of the 84 parts of the violin was not pro-perly adjusted. The instructors showed bows made of fiber glass and taught the listeners how to rehair them. The lectures were so interesting and so

It is of great concern that there are no schools of violin making or repair established in our country although we own fourfifths of the finest instruments of the world. There are no such schools in Russia or England. There is a school of this kind in France and one in West Ger-

There are few textbooks on violin making. Tesovnik explained, "Those who make violins don't write and those who write don't make violins.

Tesovnik was one of a group of ten, who after attending classes all day, met each evening to compare notes in order that each detail of the instruction might be exact. Fine violin makers of New York City opened up their shops for exhibition to the members of the workshop.

"I have never in my life seen such an array of famous instruments," exclaimed Tesovnik, One ornate violin was displayed, which required 1500 hours in its making. There were violins making. There were violins made by Guarnerious, the contemporary competitor of Stradavari, by the Frenchman, Villuame, and by Amait, Gagliano and by Pressenda. Old violins were shown that had six and eight strings instead of the four that have been in use over four hundred years.

Time Is Important For Irrigating Grain Sorghum

by Buddy C. Logsdon County Agent
