ROYAL JOKES.

Stories of Playful Capers Indulged In by

Royalty dearly loves a jobe, and nowhere are practical jokes so much in vegue as in the palaces of the old world monarchs. Curiously enough, their idea of joking, like their conception of wit, is inclined to roughness and even to downright courses ness, as well as vulgarity, rather then to delicacy, and many a practical jobe has been perpetrated in a palaco that would never have been tolerated in a grivate Louse.

One of the most peculiar practical jokes was that erganized in the council chamber of the late King Alfonso of Spain by his intimate friend and favorite companies, th Duke of Tamanos, who accompanies the Infanta Eulalia to this country.

It was during carnival time, and the king had complained to the duko that it was a very creary affair and entreated the nobleman to do somothing to liven things up a bit. The following merning when the Ling entered his council chamber he was almost pitched ever by a most extraordinary apparition. It appeared to bo a bag such as millers use for flour, and it was terminated by a pair of hewlegs that wer prancing about in every direction The architecture of these less once revealed to the king the ide tity of the human flourbag. It was no other than the little minister of agriculture, who, with the assistance of the Duke of Tomanos and the apparently grave and austered minister of foreign affairs, had dressed himself in his edd rig. The king joined so heartily in the laugh ter provoked by the extravagant antics of his cabinet officer that the iears streamed down his face, no was his mirth diminished when the minister, after baving finally extycated himself from the bag, showed himself with his hair, his beard and his uniform literally covered with Thank God. 'tis fallen there cated himself from the bag, showed flour.

Another menarch who is very fond of practical joking is Emperor William of Germany. On one occasion about a year after he ascended the threne his right hand was seriously injured during the rough horse play that takes place overy St. Sylvester of New Year's eve in the streets of Berlin. On that night no eitizen ventures to appear apon any public thorough faro wearing a tall hat creven a derby. He soon had several hadly wrecked hats to his credit. He then encountered an elderly citizen of portly figure and benevelent demeaner, whese looks, however, belied his character. He had been bonncied in previous years and was resolved to teach his termentors a lesson. So he had made a sort of leather skullcap, thick in texture and studded with long, sharp nails.

So when the emperer brought down his fist with all his might on the incfiensive looking tall hat his hand was pierced in many places by the nails and covered with blood, the injuries at one time (breatening lockjaw. The citizen was arrested and imprisoned pending a decision as to whether he should be prosecated on a charge of "leze majesty." Ho was, however, released, as his offense was entirely an innocent one.—San Francisco Examiner.
