Ex-Industrialist With a Social Conscience

A Brand-New American diplomat is launching his international career amid difficulties, but in a cause that is so broadly humanitarian that many eyes are fixed on him.

He has been elected chairman of the inter-governmental committee which is trying to find a place in this broad world for thousands of people whose countries have declared they do not want them.

To solve jointly this heart-breaking problem, President Roosevelt has called a conference in Switzerland of representatives of 32 democratic nations, to canvass and pool their respective facilities for taking in these 20th Century Ishmaels.

Heading the Amreican delegation, and the general meeting, is a diplomat new to diplomacy, and yet not new to great affairs. He is Myron C. Taylor, sometime chairman of the U. S. Steel Corporation.

Taylor, who rounded out a long business career by reorganizing financially the huge U. S. Steel Corporaiton, and by signing the first general labor contract ever granted in the United States by a great steel company, appears now in a new role. His business career behind him, he aunounced that he intended to devote much of his remaining span to public service.

The assignment to the refugee conference followed.

Taylor is hard at work there to get definite results that will to some extent alleviate this mass of misery.

This may seem a strange occupation for the one-time head of the great steel combine. Yet it is not so strange when it is first remembered that Taylor is a Quaker. As such he is a member of the sect which is making so gallant a fight throughout the world to see that pity shall not perish, nor mercy be forgotten.

People were estonished when Taylor took his revolutionary step in signing a labor contract with the C. I. O. on behalf of U. S. steel. They would have been less so if Taylor's Quaker modesty had not obscured a social conscience which guided a long career devoted to New York's Family Welfare, United Hospital and Mobilization for Human Needs relief campaigns. He had also quietly served his government on committees under both Presidents Hoover and Roosevelt.

If Taylor succeeds to any extent at all in this role of the Samaritan who was "a neighbor unto him that fell among thieves," he may well be considered a valuable addition to his country's diplomatic forces.

And in thus offering his services to mankind as well as to the country in which he prospered and fared well, he is setting an example that might well be followed by others of his position whose social conscience seems less active.

Italy is sending two cruisers around the world this summer to demonstrate her naval strength. It's certainly going to be humiliating when they run into those Atlantic war games.
