CHAPTER XI

Mr. Alexander Colby had the gift of patience. In the last few weeks, however, it had been severely tried in the matter of his daughter's marriage. For, though she had not opened her lips to him upon the subject, he knew perfectly well that the marriage was an irretrievable failure.

He knew where Waterman spent many of his evenings. He also knew quite well the business difficulties in which his son-in-law was involved. He had no doubt whatever that his daughter's husband was upon the brink of a business failure that would not bear too close examination. But Doris had not spoken. Some time, he thought. she must speak. The point was, when? And though Mr. Colby was a patient man, he found himself growing restive.

He had learned the day before from Doris that Stanley had come back and after some thought, at the luncheon hour that day, he had stepped into the vaults of his bank and extracted from his personal deposit box a certain package. This he had taken to his office, and locked up in the little safe that stood behind his desk. "Just as well to have it there," be reflected, "In

On Monday Stanley had returned from India. On Tuesday he had visited his house in the country. On Wednesday morning he called at Mr. Colby's office. The lawyer was just finishing the last of the morning's post when Stanley was announced.

"Hm," he reflected. "Here comes my horse again. Left at the post on his first start-Well, maybe there'll be

He supposed Stanley had come to onsult him about some business affairs, as he had frequently acted for him in a legal matter. He welcomed him with a smile and an outstretched hand, rising as he did so,

"Well, my lad, here you are again, eh? Come over here-let me look at He led Stanley to the window and spun him around on his heels. "You ook pretty fit-lean, brown, brighteyed-all that sort of thing!"

"Thank you, sir. Yes, I'm very well indeed. And you?"

"Well and lonesome," replied the lawyer, sitting down again. "Lonesome?"

"What else would you expect? I've lost Doris. Isn't that enough to make a man lonesome?"

The smile died from Stanley's face. its disappearance was not lost upon the lawyer. Suddenly all his patience departed. "Jim," he said abruptly. why the devil didn't Dorls marry

This was the last speech in the world that Stanley had expected to hear. It paralyzed his faculties for the moment, but presently be was able to say, "I'll tell you the truth, Mr. Colby, as I see it—I suppose it is be-cause she prefered Rollin."

"Yes," mutered the other, "I suppose that's so-I suppose that must so. But so far as I am concerned I wish to God you had kidneped ber from troubling and the weary are at !

"Are you sure?"

Stanley took a strong hold upon himself. He was stirred to his depths, but this did not prevent him from seeing with startling clearness that the lawyer was equally moved. But he did not know what to say, and in a moment the elder man controlled him-

"I'm sorry," he said. "Forget what I've said. It's none of my business yet-maybe it will be some time, but not now. I shouldn't have spoken as I did. I know how close the friendship is between you two."

. A sardonic gleam flashed across Stanley's face but still he was silent. "I suppose," resumed the lawyer after a brief slience, "you heard of our great loss?"

"Such as?" "Such as ancestral jewels of high degree." The lawyer was again his genially tronic self.

"Oh, yes," said Stanley, "I read about it in a newspaper that somebody sent out, I suppose about three months after the theft occurred. I'm ashamed to say that I forgot to say anything about it to Doris when I saw her the other night. Was the matter ever explained?"

"Not publicly," replied Mr. Colby. Stanley sensed something peculiar in the lawyer's answer, and he asked, "What do you mean-not publicly?" "I mean, Jim, that I have a definite idea upon the subject." "I read in the newspaper that the police had declared it to be an in-

"The brains of the police," declared Mr. Colby., "are for the most part manufactured by the Portland Cement company. But in this case their conclusions happened to be correct."

"One of the servants?"

"You interest me."
"I meant to." The eyes of the two men met for an instant, and then the lawyer rose and turned to the little safe that stood behind his desk, swung back the door upon its hinges, opened a drawer, carried it to his desk, and took from it a parcel wrapped in common brown paper and tied carelessly with a bit of red twine. He fumbled it a bit-to tell the truth, his fingers shook a little. But in a moment the knot yielded, and the paper was unfolded, revealing a chamols bag. This also the lawyer opened, thrust his hand within, seized the contents, and threw them upon the desk. There lay the Colby necklace!

Stanley stared with his mouth open Presently he found a cigarette and lit it. He waited, but the lawyer said nothing-merely kept on staring at the jewels. Stanley was the first to

"And why, may I ask," he said, "did you steal these jewels?"

"Don't be an ass," retorted the lawyer. "You know who stole them as well as I do." "No, I don't."

"Well, if you don't, then you are the sss, not I."

Stanley reflected a moment before he inquired suavely, "Is it possible that you retrain from mentioning the name of the thief because of my long frienship for him?"

The lawyer did not answer. He seized the jewels, thrust them back into the chamols bag, drew the running cord that closed the bag. "Jim." he said, "have you seen my son-in-law since your return?"

"And when was that?"

"On Monday evening when I called "See anything unusual about him?"

"I saw that he was drunk." "That, I regret to say, is not onno impression on him whatever. His mind was busy on another tack.

"Mr. Colby,' he asked, "has the person who stole these diamonds any notion as to their present whereabouts?" "None whatever," replied the lawyer

"Absolutely certain." The lawyer hitched his chair closer to the one in which Stanley was sitting. "Jim." he said, "I'm going to be frank with you. What I say will grieve and shock you, and perhaps you will be angry with me. Your friendship with my son-in-law is almost proverbial among those who know you both. And yet you know me well. You know that I am not a things going from bad to worse, until now I know that the marriage is a wreck and that Dorls' happiness is ruined. By this time I understand thoroughly my son-in-law's character and I know that he's a rotter. He is a libertine, a liar, and a drunkard. He is also a thief. Now," and he glared defiantly at Stanley, "what have you got Somewhat to his surprise Stanley murmured only one word, "Nothing." "Very well, then," continued Mr. Colby. "His public disgrace I can and will prevent for my daughter's sake. She cannot possibly know more than a part of what I have told you. Any affection that she once had for him must long ago have died-yet she has done her best to save him. But she knows by now that she has falled. Yet not one syllable of complaint has passed her lips. This cannot go on much longer. Some time, and the time will not be long, she must come to me for comfort, as she used to do when she was a tiny girl and had fallen down and bumped her little nose. And when she does-" He figished with an expressive gesture.

This time it was Stanley who hitched his chair nearer to the lawnouncement would have come as a per. He spoke for five minutes wig-

Newton Admired Crimson

Search in the records of Somerset House has disclosed the complete inventory of the furniture and plenishing of Sir Isaac Newton's bouse in St. Martin's to the Fields in 1727. The document took the inconvenient form of about fifteen feet of strips of vellum. Sir Maac's favorite color for hangings was crimson. He had it in most of his rooms, the material being mohair backed with canvas. His taste in furniture ran towards walnut. He held a large private IIbrary for that period, and it must have taken up much space, for more than half of the 1,896 books were folios or quartos.

Somebody's Watching

There is no one so obscure but that some one is modeling his life

shock to Stanley. Now it produced | out interruption. When he departed a quarter of an hour later, he carried with him the little chamols

> Leaving the lawyer's office Stanley walked two blocks south on Broadway. He turned to the left and in the middle of the block turned in and was carried twenty stories up. Is-suing from the elevator he walked in-to his old office and inquired for Mr. Waterman.

"Name, please," said an office bo, whom he had never seen before. He gave his name, and was taken directly into his old private office-now Waterman's.

"Here you are," said Waterman gatly, rising and giving him his hand. 'Seem like home to you, eh?"

"Yes-yes." "Always liked your private office the best, so after you'd gone I moved in here. Well, how are you? Hope you're going out to lunch with me?"

"Sorry," said Stanley. "Can't. I've got to go uptown." "Too bad. How about dinner at the club?" "Can't make it. You see I've got the Swami more or less on my hands, and until I get him launched I've got to stand by.'

"How about tomorrow?" Stanley swiftly reflected. His visit to Waterman was the last thing he wished for, yet he had made the appointment from design. It was imperative to the success of the course upon which he had now embarked that Waterman and Doris should spend the week end at his home in the country. Everything hung on that. He therefore wished to do everything in his power to make Waterman feel at ease with him. So he answered:

"Yes. I'm free for lunch tomorrow Anywhere you like."

"Fine," said Waterman, "Make it the Strollers club. Never see anybody there you know. We've got a lot to talk about, and we shan't be interrupted."

"Yes," agreed Stanley. "You're right. We have a lot to talk about. And don't forget," he said, as he turned to go, "you're coming down to the country on Saturday."

"Sure," agreed Waterman promptly. "Wouldn't miss it for anything."

As he spoke he slapped Stanley on the shoulder in his old hearty, friendly way. His hand rested for an instant within six inches of the Colby diamonds!

. Thus far, Waterman reflected, the week end party at Stanley's country house had been entirely successful. Waterman had not come upon the visit without some trepidation. So far as Stanley was concerned, it is true, he felt no uneasiness. He had seen nothing in his old friend's manner to alarm him in the least. There were, to be sure, moments when he sensed a difference, but after all, he reflected, they had not seen each other for over a year and, say what you would, absence did change people. The Watermans had arrived late the previous afternoon by motor from New York. They were welcomed not only by Jim himself, but also by Mrs. Butchinson, Jim's only sister, who had motored over from her own country house a dozen miles away, to complete the party, at her brother's request. There had been no opportunity for intimate talk. Stanley had taken care of that. His mind was so filled with the thing he had to do that very night. that he had no wish for a tete-a-tete either with Rollin or with Doris. His main concern was to keep Waterman in bilseful unconsciousness of the blow that was about to fall upon blm.

Waterman reflected that, after all It was a good thing for him that Jim had come back. Jim had always been his good fairy-no doubt he would continue to be so.

In another room, just across the wide hall, reflections of a quite different character were at that same moment occupying the mind of Doris. She, too, was dressing for dinnernot with her usual deliberation, but with urgent haste. She felt that she must, in some way, manage to get a few moments alone with Jim. There were certain things that must be said between them. She had in no way altered her point of view regarding her husband, since the day she had asked him to consent to a divorce. Her eyes now fully opened to his character, she had felt only contempt for the transparent efforts be had since then been making to restore himself to her favor. She read his mind all too clearly. And when, upon their return from the country club that afternoon, Waterman had settled himself in her dressing room as if for a friendly chat, she had peremptor cut him short and dismissed him. And now she was feverishly dressing

There came a tap on her chamber door, and Mrs. Hutchinson came in. "Sorry to interrupt you," she said, "but I've got to go home at once, and don't want to go without saying good-by. George has just telephoned that angdon—that's my eldest boy, you know—is sick in bed."

When your Children Cry for It

There is hardly a household that hasn't heard of Castoria! At least five million homes are never without it. If there are children in your family, there's almost daily need of its comfort. And any night may find you very thankful there's a bottle in the house. Just a few drops, and that colle or constipation is relieved; or diarrhea checked. A vegetable product; a baby remedy meant for young folks. Castoria is about the only thing you have ever heard doctors advise giving to infants. Stronger medicines are dangerous to a tiny baby, however harmless they may be to grown-ups. Good old Castoria! Remember the name, and remember to buy it. It may spare you a sleepless, anxious night. It is always ready, always safe to use; in emergencies, or for everyday allments. Any hour of the day or night that Baby becomes fretful, or restless. Castoria was never more popular with mothers than it is today. Every druggist has it.

SAME PRESCRIPTION HE WROTE IN 1892

When Dr. Caldwell started to practice medicine, back in 1875, the needs for a laxative were not as great as today. People lived normal lives, ate plain, wholesome food, and got plenty of fresh air. But even that early there were drastic physics and purges for the relief of constipation which Dr. Caldwell did not believe were good for human beings. The prescription for constipation that he used early in his practice, and which he put in drug stores in 1892 under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepain, is a liquid vegetable remedy, intended for women, children and elderly people, and they need just such a mild, safe bowel stimulant.

This prescription has proven its worth

The states of New York and Massachusetts have joined hands in the effort to head off forest fires. Monkey Loses a Home

A Detroit woman going south wanted to give her pet monkey to the Detrolt Zoological park. She called the director, but when John T. Millen said he could not promise a daily "hot water and soap bath" the monkey's owner indignantly hung up the telephone with the remark, "Cleanliness is next to Godliness even for a monkey."

"I suffered from stomach and bowel oing more quickly than ever before.

First they scampered one way, then ally got so bad that I had no life or energy left, and felt that there was no help for me. I was completely worn out all the time, had a distressed haggard look on my face. My mind was duil, my eyes blurred, and I was unable to take an interest in anything. "I commenced using Milks Emul-sion in May. It occurred to me that ful improvement Milks Emulsion had made in my health and appearance, would be to send you the picture that I happened to have taken a few weeks before I started using your Milks Emulsion, and to have another picture taken now, and send both to you.

"I am still taking your Milks Emulbegan to use Milks Emulsion, and now I weigh 138 pounds. It has cleared up my complexion, made my eyes bright and a difference in my looks, as you will see by the two pictures. I don't look like the same woman. To my mind it is Nature's beautifier.
