Central Texas Conference Returns Rev. Crain to Gatesville Pastorate

The 81st annual session of the Central Texas Conference of the Methodist church convened at First Methodist church in Fort Worth on Tuesday of last week. Bishop A. Frank Smith, Houston, presided; Rev. W. W. Ward, superintendent of the Fort Worth district, served as secretary.

Floyd E. Johnson of Gatesville, was one of the assistants to Bishop Smith in making assignments of pastors to the various churches in the conference, and expressed himself as being very happy in the re-assignment of the Rev. Hubert W. Crain to the Gatesville First Methodist church, where he had served for the past year with notable progress made in every branch of church work.

Two outstanding business decisions of the conference was the changing of the meeting date of the Central Texas Conference meeting from November to early in the month of June, 1947, and the adoption of the proposed Wesley Foundation Campaign. Action was taken by the conference to raise $50000 during the coming conference year. Of this sum $10,000 will be allotted a Bible chair at John Tarleton College in Stephenville, and the same amount for the same purpose at NTAC at Arlington. The remaining $30,000 will be used to establish Bible chairs and assist in the work of Methodist students attending state colleges in Texas.

Assignment of pastors to the various churches for the ensuing year, read at the conclusion of the conference Friday, by Bishop Smith, gives the following minister personnel in the Gatesville District:

YOU'VE GOT TWO CHANCES TO VOTE THIS WEEK; ONCE TODAY AND ONCE THURSDAY

Two elections in one week is a bargain for everyone, except where the expense is concerned. It takes just as much, or nearly as much, money if you vote as if you don't. The danged things are paid for and you do the paying, and certainly should get your bargain. In the first go-round today, it's the General Election, and even with the room we have in this paper, we can't run the ballot. However, all the parties are listed, and you can take your choice, but, anyway, vote. In the second, it's a special election, caused, they say by an error; but anyway you pay, so why not vote. Below are the two questions:

Incidentally, we're not ordering, but asking the election judges to turn in their reports. The Texas Election Bureau wants to add up ALL the votes as soon as possible, and for that reason, they need Coryell county's.

County Clerk A. W. Ellis, said Monday 8 mail and 1 vote in person was all the interest shown in the two elections.

Construction Work Starts On Large Leaird Store Building, East Side Square..

Byron Leaird, Sr., in conversation Friday morning with a Coryell County New reporter said the contract has been awarded Fred Smith of Gatesville for the reconstruction of the south half of the big stone and brick structure, gutted by flames when the Leaird Department store burned in the most disastrous fire in the history of the Gatesville business district.

Workmen have been engaged for several weeks past on the site removing half burned timbers and repairing damaged wall structures and cleaning rubbish from the ground inside the walls. The heavy steel reinforcement for the building is being erected, and Mr. Leaird explained, is a big job since each of the rafters weighs over 4,000 pounds. The concrete superstructure, and the floors will be in process of construction in the very near future, but the building will probably not be ready for occupancy by the Leaird dry goods department before the first of the year.

Byron Leaird, Sr., said that the new furniture and fixtures are among "scarce articles" on the market, and are very expensive to buy, and that removal of the dry goods from the present location just off the northeast corner of the square will likely be delayed somewhat since the re-establishment in the former location is to be altogether modern and classy in set-up. "We have an abiding faith in a great future for Gatesville and Coryell county," said Mr. Leaird, "and it is our aim to build to that future".

London Today

England suffered much during the war. Many blocks in the heart of the great city of London, completely razed by the Nazi "Luftwaffe," remain unrepaired. All parts of the city sustained scattered damage from the raids. They took much punishment bravely, and they are industriously setting about to repair their country.

Perhaps it is partly Britain's proximity to continental troublemakers and the consequent disaster, although some of these trouble spots have been pawn as well as threat during her history, that gives the people such an awareness of foreign relations. They have learned the defenses that are usually provided by a good foreign office, and have developed shrewd international statesmen. There is little apparent disunity in their foreign policy.

Nonetheless, war came to them, and their sufferings were great. Reconstruction in Britain is moving slowly. A long time will be required for complete rebuilding, even of her damaged streets and destroyed buildings. Materials are short, and rationing diverts most materials into home building, which is proceeding slowly also.

Rationing Slow-Down

Most Britons feel that rationing of materials has slowed production. The government is meticulous about "filling out forms," and the proper approval must be had to obtain each different type of building material. Sometimes brickwork must stop because the bureau controlling glass has not approved and returned the forms for buying windows.

The London press announced while I was there that building contractors were being granted extra gasoline rations because of the additional travel required to get their numerous forms filled out and circulated to wholesalers and retailers, which they found necessary to do in order to complete a building.

All rationing seems to move slowly. For instance, I had to obtain food points to give the hotel for the week I was in London. Upon the advice of the hotel manager that I should report at the rationing office when the doors opened at nine o'clock, I arrived at 8:45 and found a long queue already waiting. Eventually I found myself in a special room for foreign visitors, with only a few of the waiting applicants, and had to wait only about an hour. The speed of the ration clerks reminded me of some of our own paid clerks during the war: it was evident they were not paid by the number of customers they served and that they had no fear of competition.

Queues and Bread

England is experiencing a greater shortage of food, clothing, and gasoline than during the war, and therefore rationing has not been eliminated. On the contrary, some items are now rationed which were not under rationing during the war. Queues of from 50 to 300 people were constantly on the streets, at most all hours, waiting to get rationed articles.

I was actually hungry every day I spent in England. Bread counts as one of the three courses available for a London dinner, and if bread is ordered this eliminates either the soup or sweet. During my last day in London a hotel waiter was fined $20 for inadvertently putting a roll on the table for each of two men who had not ordered bread. They chanced to be inspectors.

WHAT HAS GONE BEFORE:

The year is 1912, and in New York's 52nd Street high-hatted elegance reigns supreme. But not with Rufus Rondell, who marries Evelyn Macey, show-girl, estranging his straight-laced elder sisters, Adela and Letitia. Evelyn dies leaving Rufus with a three-year-old girl, Margaret. Evelyn's friends, Sid and Jack, whom Rufus had backed in the first 52nd Street night club venture, prosper exceedingly. They give Benny Zamarelli, son of Rufus' picturesque friend Fiorello, a job as piano player, much to the disgust of Fiorello who wanted the boy to be a great concert pianist. Margaret, now grown up, comes home from abroad for a visit and falls in love with Benny. Rufus and Fiorello join in establishing a night club near Sid and Jack's, hoping to drive them out of business and Benny back to serious music. They win great prosperity, fortunately for the Rondell sisters, whose fortune is wiped out in the 1929 crash but whom Rufus continues to support lavishly through his night club profits unknown to them.

Chapter Four

Sid and Jack were in their private office, dividing the week's profits. Oddly enough, Jack's pile of currency towered high above that of Sid, who, in his groping way, suspected that something was wrong without quite being able to put his finger on it.

His doubts were swept away by the magnificent, unanswerable logic of Jack's explanation. "Fifty-fifty—that's our arrangement, ain't it? I get half of what we make and half of what you make."

They were interrupted by the arrival of Benny and his father—the latter as volubly incoherent as ever. But Benny was strangely silent.

"What are you sit there like a idiot for?" Fiorello suddenly asked him.

"I was just thinking of Margaret," replied Benny. "Back tomorrow night—boy, oh boy, oh boy!"

"Tell you what," spoke up Jack. "We'll give her a party—and Rufus Rondell won't know nothin' about it till it's too late to stop us!" Here, for once, was something they could all agree on. They fell to discussing the party plans with more animation than practical good sense.

Rufus Rondell had met his little girl at the pier, and was taking her home in his limousine. On the way they planned her homecoming celebration—just a nice, quiet little dinner at home for two. Then Rufus broached what was uppermost in his mind. He wanted Margaret to call on his embittered sisters—whom she had never seen—and bury the family hatchet.

Margaret demurred. "My mother wasn't good enough for them, and still you want me to—"

"Please, Margaret. It's just for your own good—"

"I'm sorry, father," the girl spoke out of the depth of her feeling of pride. "Not only do I refuse, but if you ever did what you want me to do, I'd never speak to you again."

While the Rondells were speeding homeward, their spacious living room had been taken over by Fiorello, Sid and Jack, and the staffs of their respective hot spots.

While they waited, an old rift was reopened between the loyal employees of the two cafes. Betty, the specialty dancer of Rufus' and Fiorello's place, declared that her hot break—her "ta-dee-ah"—had been stolen by the absent Minnie, who danced for Sid and Jack. Minnie's co-workers sprang to her defense; Betty's sidekicks joined the argument; and soon the whole house was filled with a turmoil of argument.

The door flung open, and into the thick of the argument stepped Rufus and Margaret. The arguers immediately stopped arguing and shouted in unison:

"Surprise! Surprise!"

Then, while they fluttered around Margaret to welcome her home, Benny started the orchestra with a dance number, and almost before she realized it she was dancing in his arms. Scarcely pausing to note the arrival at the party of the much-discussed Minnie, on the arm of one Porky, a leading gangster, Benny danced his partner out to the balcony, where they paused alone in the moonlight.

"Why did you do that?" she asked him.

"This party couldn't be a success unless you and I were alone."

"Remember the time we first met?" she laughed. "You were sitting in that flower-bed down there, with a black eye. I'm pleased to know you, I said. And you said, 'Yeh... Sure... And I'm pleased to know you.'"

"We were pleased, weren't we, Margaret," he whispered.

She went on in more serious mood. "Benny... I heard a lot of gossip in London... about a secret my Dad has... you know what I mean?"

Benny tried to change the subject, but his strategy failed.

"Benny," continued Margaret, "Europe knows all about 52nd Street. And I know what my father is—what he does. But he has never told me himself, and if I should tell him, I know it would hurt his pride. It isn't that I don't like cafes, Benny, it's just that he hasn't been honest with me. You may think I'm mean when I say this, but if something might happen that would expose him—you understand?—the humiliation might bring back my father to me—the sort of father I've always wanted."

"So you want something to happen, eh?" grinned Benny. "I think I can fix it for you."

He left her, strode into the room, and accosted Porky, the trigger man, who was dancing with Minnie. "Harya, Pork?" chirped Benny. "How's the hold-up business?" Then, while Porky's face hardened, Benny turned to Minnie. "Say, Minnie, Betty says you stole her ta-dee-ah!" Having planted this much dynamite, Benny turned and lightly stepped out to the balcony again.

In a few minutes the battle was on in full swing. Minnie and Betty were locked in a good, old-fashioned hair-pulling match; adherents of both were arguing ferociously about who had stolen the ta-dee-ah. Benny stepped to the telephone and made a quiet little call.

When the brawl had grown into a healthy young riot a few car loads of police arrived. And as Rufus, Fiorello, Benny, Margaret and the rest of the company rolled down the street in the patrol wagon, Benny happily crooned his favorite song to the eagerly listening Margaret: "It's unbelievable that you could care for me... while Betty and Minnie, united in their hour of trouble, joined in together with the 'ta-dee-ah.'"

George Richard Hodges Weds Waco Girl In Home Rites, Friday

Of interest in a wide circle of Gatesville friends is the following story of the wedding of George Richard Hodges to Miss Eva Beth Crump, given in the society columns of the Waco Tribune-Herald in the Sunday, November 3 edition.

Miss Eva Beth Crump became the bride of George Richard Hodges, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Hodges of Gatesville, in a double-ring ceremony performed at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. L. N. Crump, 2212 McFerrin avenue, by Dr. Arthur Stout Friday night. Vows were said before an improvised altar of palms and candelabra, with only the immediate family.

The bride's frock of blue crepe was trimmed with black lace and she wore black accessories. She carried a white Bible topped with a single orchid. Miss Virginia Nell Crump, the bride's sister, who was maid of honor, wore a dress of gray with black accessories. Mrs. Elwood Blankenship, the bridegroom's sister, chose a fuchsia frock and black accessories. Both the attendants' corsages were of white carnations. Mr. Hodges was attended by William Curlin as best man, and Elwood Blankenship. Candles were lighted before the ceremony by James Hodges.

A reception at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Blankenship, 2625 Alexander avenue, followed the wedding.

After a short wedding trip the couple will reside at 2625 Alexander avenue.
