THE OLD PIRATES.

Were Cowards, Pilferers and Traitors to One Another.

The average pirate does not de for ferocity. Pirates were brutes unquestionably and, like Captain would exercise a "pretty severity" in order to extort confessions from prisoners whom they suspected of men tell no tales and the dispatch "on the plundering account," and mankind is nowhere more visible than among these oppressors of unarmed traders and black villagers. Men who must have known that surrender would infallibly take them straight to the gallows laid down their arms to any decently appointed force without a blow. Every man hoped that he would save his neck, whatever happened to the thers. At the worst they put off the evil hour. Two of Avery's crew who were ondemned to death petitioned that f they must be hanged they might t least be sent "to suffer in India." They may have hoped for escape on the way, but even if they were unable to get off it was better to be sent to die some months hence in India than to go to Execution dock omorrow. They clung to their miserable lives to the last moment. Stevenson's pirates -- cowards, pilferers, traitors to one another-in "The Master of Ballantrae" are the real men as they were. The pirates of "Treasure Island" are boys' book pirates. They are excellent of their kind, and Stevenson produced them with pleasure, but nobody knew better than he that they were but fantoches. A parent who found his boy becoming too fond of pirate stories might do worse than put the right volumes of state trials into his hands, and, if he could only obtain a copy, then also the broadside which contains "a full and true Discovery of all the Robberies, Pyracies and other notorious actions of that famous English Pyrate Capt. James Kelly, who was executed on Friday, 12th of July, 1700." The liscovery purports to be a confesabundant signs of being, in fact, taken down from his mouth by a convist who heard him ill and reports him with grotesque misspellngs. - David Hannay in Black
