Veterinarian urges vaccination of pets

"Rabies kills people."

That's the message from Dr. Guy Ellis of the Clarendon Vet-, erinary Hospital this week, reinforcing an earlier plea from city officials for people to have their pets vaccinated for the disease.

Ellis says the cases of rabies in the Texas Panhandle have doubled from what they were last year, and he says this year's drought is making things worse as wildlife come into populated areas.

"We are in an area very prone to rabies right now," Ellis says. "The chance of pets being near a rabid animal is high."

A person bitten by a rabid animal, if not treated right away, is almost certain to die from the disease, Ellis said.

Ellis says a rabies vaccine costs just $12.50. The shot lasts up to three years, but Ellis says yearly boosters are needed under current conditions.

"Vaccinating your animals should be as common as giving them food and water," Ellis says.

Aldermen consider revitalizing downtown

Grant funds could pay for sidewalk and lighting improvements in downtown Clarendon, according to a presentation at last Monday's meeting of the Board of Aldermen.

Representatives of KSA Engineers discussed the possibility of the city applying for the Texas Capital Fund grant and gave city officials an overview of their company's services.

In addition to sidewalk and lighting improvements, the project would involve replacing aging waterlines currently located under the bricks of Kearney Street with new lines placed beneath the sidewalks.

The total project could cost between $450,000 and $900,000, depending on if the waterlines and electrical work are included.

The maximum award under this type of grant is $150,000, which means the city would have to have multiple successful grant applications over at least a six-year period to do the entire project.

The city would have to provide matching funds of up to 30 percent for each grant.

City Administrator Lambert Little says the proposal is in its very early stages. The deadline for the application, if the city decides to pursue the grant, is not until summer of 2012.

Sweet sounds!

Clarendon was one of seven bands to receive a Division One rating and the opportunity to advance to area competition on October 29 in Amarillo. Government not Wall St. drives up student debt

By Neal McCluskey and Vance Fried

One of the major complaints of the Occupy Wall Street crowd, many of whom have taken on significant student debt, is that the cost of college is too darn high. And they're right, but not because of greedy corporate fat cats. No, the real guilty party here is federal politicians, who for decades have been fueling high profits — and prices — at both for-profit and nonprofit schools.

Wait. Big profits at nonprofit colleges? Yes, money has been piling up even at schools you thought had no interest in profit. And Washington, D.C., is the biggest hand feeding the beast.

Thanks to recent congressional hearings and battling over new regulations for for-profit schools, most people - including many college-aged, profitdisdaining Wall Street squatters - are probably at least vaguely aware that for-profit colleges are making good money.

But not just openly profit-seeking schools are making big bucks. If we define profit simply as revenue derived from providing a service exceeding costs, putatively nonprofit colleges actually have much higher margins than for-profit schools.

How do we know that? It's tough, because nonprofit schools typically report all their profits as expenses. Basically, they take excess revenues coming from undergraduate education and distribute them throughout the college in subsidies for research, graduate education, low-demand majors, low faculty teaching loads, excess compensation or featherbedding. In other words, rather than rewarding investors, colleges pay themselves.

Given this surplus-into-costs alchemy, there are just a few ways to get at schools' real costs. One is the buildup method, in which you calculate all the inputs required to educate undergrads, from market-rate professors' salaries to photocopying costs. The second is to get the best internal accounting of actual college expenditures you can, which a few states furnish, and estimate costs from that.

Using both methods reveals that it costs roughly $8,000 to educate an undergraduate at an average, residential college.

Now look at your college bill, including room and board: An average of almost $37,000 at a private fouryear university, and $16,000 at a public equivalent.

So what's the profit? The average tuition and fee charge at a private bachelor's college, minus institutional aid, was $13,515 in 2008. Subtract $8,000 from that, and just from tuition and fees the school made about $5,500 per student, a margin of 41%. Add donated money like endowment funds, which are often intended to help undergraduate students, and the margins become even bigger.

Profits are similar at public institutions — only what schools don't get from tuition they make in state subsidies.

This is where Washington's policies come in. Colleges have been able to achieve these stunningly high profit margins by radically increasing the prices they charge students. Inflation-adjusted tuition and fees have tripled in the last 30 years.

Politicians have enabled schools to charge these skyrocketing rates in the name, ironically, of helping students. Indeed, inflation-adjusted federal aid to students has quadrupled since 1980, going from $35.4 billion to approximately $146.5 billion. Meanwhile, total student debt has leapt ahead of total credit card debt, blowing past the $800 billion mark.

In other words, the feds have been blasting helium into the college-cost bubble, enabling profits — which, if driven by undistorted demand, could be good — to balloon at the expense of students and taxpayers.

Fortunately, since Washington has been a big part of the problem, it can be a major part of the solution. One relatively easy thing it can do is change financial aid rules that give schools sizable advantages over students when setting after-aid prices. Basically, when students apply for aid the feds give schools students' total financial pictures, enabling colleges to change their after-aid prices on a student-by-student basis. Students have no such insider knowledge about schools.

The politically tougher, but essential, move would be to phase out the big subsidies to students that enable schools to raise prices with impunity. That means reducing everything from Pell Grants, to cheap student loans, to tuition tax deductions.

The outcry would be that this will hurt students, an objection that would probably issue loudly from the people raging against the financial machine. But it would do the opposite, forcing schools to keep their prices in line with the real cost of providing education, and saving both students and taxpayers big bucks. And that is what everyone should want.

Obama still has a shot at re-election

By Martin Frost

There appears to be a fundamental disconnect between the Obama campaign and the Obama White House. It is not too late for this to be corrected and President Barack Obama still has a legitimate shot at being re-elected. However, time is a wasting.

Let me be specific. The Obama campaign believes that the path to reelection is high minority turnout, high turnabout among young voters and unusual Democratic strength among independent, college-educated suburban voters. This is not the path to 350 electoral votes — but it could get Obama the 270 electoral votes he needs for reelection.

However, the Obama White House is advocating positions that undercut the Obama campaign reelection narrative.

Obama has upped the rhetoric designed to inspire the Democratic base. One part of this has been to advocate a millionaire's tax increase. So far, so good.

At the same time, however, the Obama White House has sent Congress a jobs plan that would be partially financed by increasing taxes on collegeeducated, suburban voters, who earn more than $250,000 in family income. This would be done, in part, by limiting deductions for charitable giving and home mortgage interest for taxpayers in that category.

So much for appealing to suburban voters in Northern Virginia, the research triangle in North Carolina, metro Denver, metro Philadelphia and metro Cleveland. Obama will need these regions to carry swing states — like Colorado, Pennsylvania and Ohio — in what could be a very close election.

There are two possible explanations for this apparent disconnect.

(1) The Obama campaign and the Obama White House don't talk on a regular basis. Something I find hard to believe.

(2) The Obama White House thinks has already polled the question. that the media —and the public — won't notice if it pushes for taxes on millionaires and on upper middle class suburban voters. That the press will just focus on the former.

The problem with this second theory is that moderate Senate Democrats like Bill Nelson of Florida, Claire McCaskill of Missouri and Ben Nelson of Nebraska – all of whom are up for reelection in 2012 – are paying attention to this disconnect even if the press is not. As a result, they are unlikely to vote for the president's tax increases on collegeeducated, suburban independents.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) have certainly noticed. They are urging an approach that abandons the tax increase on suburban independents and instead pays for the jobs bill solely with the millionaire's surtax. The question is whether the White House will follow their lead.

Polling indicates that Obama's assault on millionaires is working. The public is clearly with him on this. I have not seen any polling data on what think about Obama's proposal to raise their taxes. But the negative reaction to this proposal by moderate senators up for reelection would indicate someone Obama is far from being a lame duck yet. He certainly can be reelected. Everyone is assuming that this race will be similar to 2004, when President George W. Bush won a narrow reelection. The Bush campaign had no margin for error, and ran a very smart race.

Obama can do the same thing in 2012. But to do so, the disconnect between their reelection strategy and the to end.

It's not easy subsidizing green energy

By Jarrett Skorup

The bankruptcy of "green jobs" darling Solyndra is still in the news because it could cost U.S. taxpayers $535 million due to a federal "stimulus" program loan guarantee. The Silicon Valley solar-panel maker's failure comes on the heels of another "green" corporate-welfare beneficiary going under, Evergreen Solar. These deals were big losers for Ameri-

Both businesses reject claims that company management or the current market for "green" energy products were the cause of their failure. Instead, company officials cite intense competition from lower-cost Chinese manufacturers: "The solar power market is intensely competitive and rapidly evolving," wrote Evergreen Solar's chief executive officer, Michael El-Hillow. "In particular, solar manufacturers in China continue to receive considerable government and financial support and, together with China's low manufacturing costs, have become price leaders within the indus-

"Prices of silicon came down as the Chinese volume increased; they were able to get to very low costs and become competitive," said former Solyndra CEO Brian Harrison.

U.S. Department of Energy Department officials are promoting the same party line, saying that "less expensive solar panels made by governmentsubsidized companies in China undercut Solyndra's products."

"Chinese companies have flooded the market with inexpensive panels, and Europe—currently the largest customer base for solar panels—has suffered from an economic crisis that has significantly reduced demand and forced cuts in subsidies for solar deployment that were important to Solyndra's business model," said Jonathan Silver, who heads the Department of Energy's loan-guarantee program, to the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Proponents of costly government "green jobs" subsidies-without which these firms would probably never have existed on such a scale—claim that select "clean" energy (wind, hydro and solar but not nuclear or natural gas) is the wave of the future, and worth risking taxpayer dollars to support.

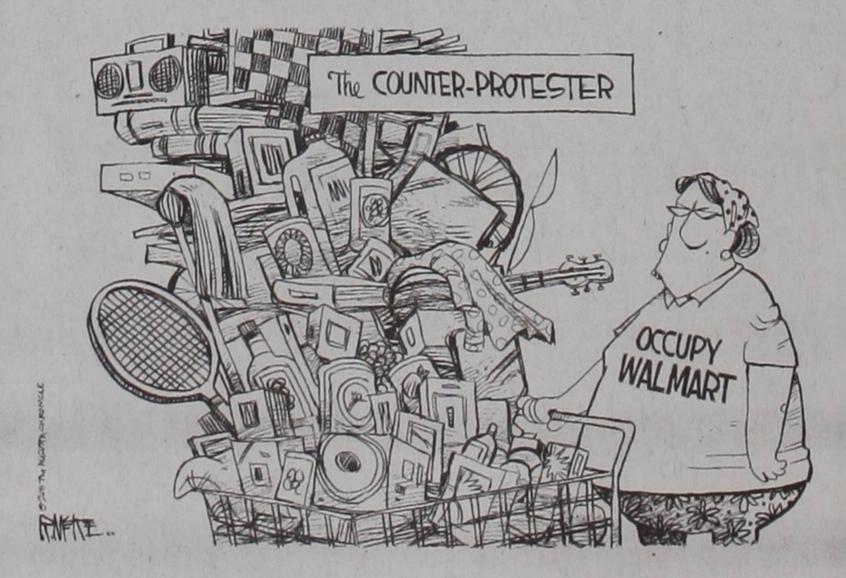

If that is so, why wouldn't they welcome lower-cost Chinese versions of these products, which presumably would bring about our economy's transition from "evil" fossil fuels even more rapidly? Or at the very least, let the Chinese government, instead of American taxpayers, take the hits for allocating capital through politics rather than market reali-

Those favoring these energy subsidies may disagree, believing that sending taxpayer money to politically connected companies is actually a "jobs creator."

Disregarding the mountains of evidence that government is notoriously bad at picking economic winners, just looking at these two-solar companies should show that this is a bad argument: The companies combined to employ about 1,500 people at the time of their bankruptcies (a few hundred for Evergreen Solar and 1,100 for Solyndra). On top of the federal funds, Evergreen Solar received $58.6 million from the state of Massachusetts and millions more from Michigan sources, while Solyndra got $535 million in federal aid and more from California. This is, in the words of my colleague Michael LaFaive, an expensive game creating the illusion of State and federal governments should stop using selective economics and get out of this game altogether.

Test Vaccine for TB Effective

According to a recent study in the journal Nature Medicine, an experimental vaccine consisting of a modified bacteria similar to the bacteria that causes tuberculosis (TB) has been found to be safe, and it protected test animals against the bacteria that causes this condition. Researchers at Albert Einstein College of Medicine (New York) connected with the study focused their efforts on genes in a bacteria that is known for its ability to outsmart the body's immune system. They removed these genes from the bacteria and then injected the bacteria into mice test animals. The immune system in the animals produced an immune response that appeared to clear the infection. They tried another approach with a different modified bacteria and then later gave another group of test animals the bacteria that causes TB. The animals that survived for more than 200 days showed no signs of the presence of TB-related bacteria.

According to information from the World Health Organization, TB infection affects one in three persons worldwide and just over 1.5 million people die from this condition each year.

Munitions Response Site Prioritization Protocol Texas Army National Guard

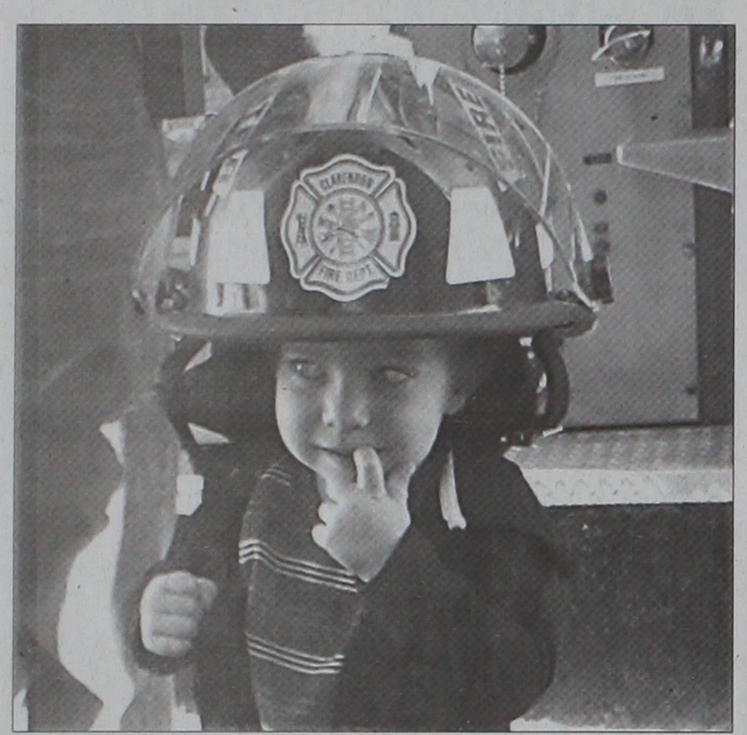

Taking into consideration various factors relating to safety and environmental hazard potential, the Texas Army National Guard intends to apply the Munitions Response Site Prioritization Protocol (MRSPP) at the following Military Munitions Response Program sites:

- Non-Department of Defense Owned Non-Operational Defense Site (NDNODS) Kerens National Guard Target Range (TXHQ-002-R-01)
- NDNODS Lake Crook Artillery Range (TXHQ-008-R-01) Groom Weekend Training Site (TXHQ-010-R-01)
- La Reforma Training Site (TXHQ-011-R-01).

The Department of Defense (DoD) has conducted training and testing of weapon systems at active and former military installations throughout the United States to ensure force readiness and defend our nation. While the DoD has made great progress in addressing the potential hazards associated with former munitions-related activities, there remains work to be done. Through direction provided by Congress, the DoD has developed the MRSPP which assigns priorities to defense sites containing unexploded ordnance, discarded military munitions or munitions constituents.

The Texas Army National Guard is in the process of completing a Site Inspection for the sites listed above and shall evaluate the sites by applying the MRSPP. The MRSPP includes criteria for evaluating the potential explosive hazard associated with munitions, as well as the potential hazard to human health resulting from releases of munitions constituents into groundwater, soil, and other environmental media. In accordance with the 32 CFR Part 179 requirements information collected will be used to apply the MRSPP and will be made available for public review by requesting media through the office of Mr. David Boucher, Texas Army National Guard, Post Office Box 5218 Austin, Texas 78763-5218, 512-782-5753 or David.n.boucher@us.army.mil.

BENEFITS THE ESA SORORITY

Clarendon Church of Christ ANGRY WITH GRACE?

What do you mean, "angry with grace?" Some people are angry for grace to abound, at least for it to abound for others. For example, you remember in Jonah, he was supposed to go and preach to Ninevah. He didn't want to because he hated those people. You know the rest of the story, he is swallowed by a great fish and changes his mind about doing God's will. He goes to Ninevah and tells them to repent, and they did. In Jonah 4:2, Jonah tells God that he knew that God would relent and not destroy these people. That was the reason he didn't want to speak to them, he knew that if they repented God would extend His grace to them.

How about the Prodigal Son? He came back home and there was much celebration except for one person, the elder son. "You never killed a fatted calf for me," he said. Instead of being happy for his brother, he was sullen and angry. He was angry with the grace the father had extended to his wayward son. Luke 15 tells us that everyday the father had watched for his son and looked for his return. The prodigal son "came to himself" in a pig pen and repented of his actions. The father extended grace to the boy when he came back.

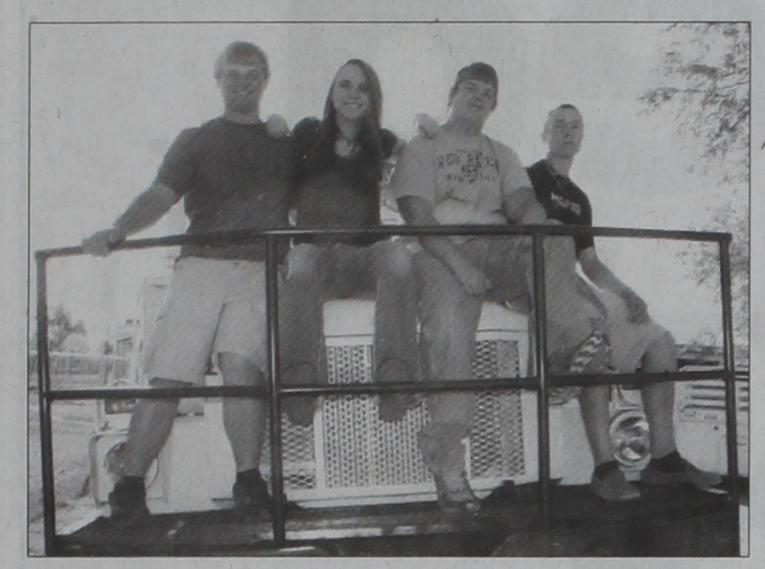

Why would anyone be angry about God giving grace to others? They have their own idea of "who" should be getting it. Of course all believe that they should have grace but not so sure others "deserve" it. God extended His grace for everyone by sending His Son, John 3:16. Of course not everyone will be recipients of that grace because some do not really want it. God's grace does have some conditions to receive it. If you remember from the accounts of Ninevah and the Prodigal Son, all repented before they received God's grace. If repentance wasn't needed, why did God send Jonah to Ninevah? Why didn't the "father" send word to the Prodigal Son that he had been forgiven without a change in his life? Grace doesn't work that way. It is a free gift, but only to those who meet the qualifications set by Jesus. Hebrews 5:9 tells us that Jesus is the author of our salvation. That means He decided how it would be extended. "Not everyone who says Lord, Lord will enter heaven but he who does the will of My Father ... ",

Matthew 7:21. I pray that everyone would seek God and His amazing grace. It is free, but there are a few conditions. May God bless you in your life and may we all live a life that glorifies God.
