THEY SHOULD KNOW

We feel we have not failed to put across the facts to our readers concerning the paper shortage, but a survey shows that onefourth of the nation's households are still uninformed of the wastepaper salvage campaign. Only half of the people questioned say they are saving paper while the other half admit that they aren't saving it regularly. Paper collectors have covered less than half the homes which means that a very large percentage of waste paper is stored waiting for disposal of some means. The newspapers of this country have surely been cognizant of the need for salvage and but very few of them have failed to put the facts before their readers and get the towns cooperation in a local campaign. If the country's newspapers have gleaned only a following of just half the citizens the campaign is not a success and its aim of salvaging eight million tons of wastepaper this year will fall flat. Seventyfive per cent of the families of the land have been reached by the press with paper shortage facts and that many are aware that to keep the present lack from becoming too acute we must collect and save all waste paper. Few towns the size of Burk have made arrangements for collecting or designating a central place where paper could be taken. Only ignorance is excusable and how could this be possible today unless we would never take our head out of the

SAY PLEASE

Those who shop in cities where working conditions are not normal due to the war, where salaries are higher and store merchandise is depleted and fingered as a consequence of heavy buying, will tell you that service seems to be failing in comparison to the prewar years. Folks who ride busses and street cars, trains, and taxis will mention the amount of discourtesy one finds today. They will figure, as a general rule, that Americans are lacking in the old-time graces that used to accompany the serving of the public. That was supposed to help business. But now, with the product hard to get, the purchaser finds that often the independence of he dealer is far from being good business manners. Chivalry in crowds is said to be lacking. Since there is a shortage of help as well as merchandise, you frequently find a cierk who serves you as though he is doing you a favor. War manners, some will say. But on the other hand you will find the majority of folks sympathetic of the workers position today, knowing that in many cases help is scarce and not experienced. Most of us will await our turn, will cheerfully stand or good-naturedly be pushed around because we blame it on the war Baptist Church, and we feel that after all, the irritated clerk or the nervous at- with Rev. F. fellow never knows just quite where he stands, out in company with a war-time shirt on his back. It has reached the place where a southern senator has poked his inside his trousers time and again with only temporary results and he now, in desperation, demands an investigation. Why should shirt tails be short with a growing at home on Harwell Street The cotton surplus, he asks. And many a mother will ask what about cloth by the yard for baby clothes, too. Anything that can be done in favor of us keeping our shirt tails long, meets with our approval home shall be a blessing to this and also attention to diapers for the nation's babies wouldn't be

DURING LENT

If ever Lent should be observed by religious followers, it should be this year. The forty days that prepare us for the observance of Easter, should find us offering prayers abundant for those lives in our army and those of our Allies. Ife we have been negligent in our supplications that peace might soon come to the world, we should use the observance of Lent in which to beseech most earnestly for the well-being of our loved ones and our country. Whatever man's faith, the time for prayer comes to all and we know its power and acknowledged force will sustain the ones for whom we ask protec-
