SOUTHWEST TEXTILES, INC. TO ADD NEW FRAMES LATER THIS YEAR

The Textile Investment Group of Texas, Inc. (TIGOT) and Nijverdal-Ten Cate of Almelo, Holland, jointly announced at a press conference August 10 the signing of a joint venture agreement that calls for a $3.5 million investment in a Lubbock cotton yarn spinning operation, with textile machinery valued at about $2 million. Production of yarn from Plains-grown cotton is programmed to begin in the fall of 1974.

TIGOT is a two-year-old group of 12 investors on the Plains concerned with the future of High Plains cotton as a textile raw material. Nijverdal-Ten Cate, with extensive operations both in and outside the European Common Market, is the largest and one of the oldest integrated textile firms in the Netherlands.

The newly formed joint venture company, known as Feather Fabrics, Incorporated, will operate from an industrial building leased for the purpose at 44th Street and Globe Avenue. Lubbock, officials said.

On hand for the announcement were J. Alberdigh Thijm, President of Nijverdal-Ten Cate, and the firm's Technical Affairs Director, Dr. Evert Ten Cate. Both expressed confidence in the success of the international venture, with Thijm adding "Our consultants have determined that the textile investment climate in Lubbock is excellent, and that Feather Fabrics is a proper vehicle for that investment."

The Feather Fabrics (FFI) plant will be built around an initial 2,400 spindles of the relatively new "open end" spinning system which produces yarn from three to four times as fast as the conventional ring spinning process. It will occupy about 40,000 square feet of space, operate 24 hours a day, six days a week, and will employ from 8 to 10 people per shift. Production is expected to be about 7 million pounds of yarn annually, consuming some 15,000 bales of each year's High Plains crop.

Paul Cook, who came to Lubbock two years ago from North American Rockwell, where he spent four years as Director for Textile Machinery Development, said a conventional ring-spinning plant with comparable capacity would require up to five times as much space and at least twice as much labor.

Cook went on to say "We are putting together the world's finest and most advanced textile equipment, and a prime consideration from the start has been its suitability for spinning what is now known as 'discount cottons' grown on the Plains."

The open end spinning system is most efficient in the formation of coarser yarns for which shorter, lower micronaire cottons are normally used, whatever the spinning system, Cook points out. "But studies done by personnel of the Textile Research Center at Texas Tech University and other researchers have proven that the spinning of these cottons on open end frames is far more economical than on the ring system."

It has also been proven by Tech and others, Cook stated, that yarn produced from low micronaire cottons on the open end system actually have greater strength and better uniformity than like yarns from the same system using higher, premium-price micronaire cottons.

The open end spindles to be used by FFI will come from Czechoslovakia. Bale opening will be done by the latest machinery made in the U.S., and cleaning, blending, carding and drawing equipment has been ordered from England, Switzerland and Italy.

"This foreign equipment is being used," Cook explained, "because it offers the maximum degree of automation and is shrouded for dust control. In this way we believe we will avoid any problem with standards set by the Occupational Safety and Health Act for prevention of byssinosis."

Byssinosis is a respiratory ailment common to textile workers and fast becoming a major problem with cotton spinning in the existing textile industry.

Don Anderson of Crosbyton, TIGOT's Chairman of the Board, expects this first FFI plant to be "just the beginning of textile activity that can bring substantial benefits to the High Plains cotton industry and the area economy before it runs its course."

"One of our first objectives in this plant is to prove the adaptability of our cotton to the open end system and to show a significant economic advantage for plants located in the area," he said, "and when we have done these two things we shouldn't have much trouble attracting the interest of existing textile companies and others who might be interested in similar operations."

"We have seen what the cattle feeding industry since 1960 has done to stabilize and enhance our feed grain markets on the Plains, and we see no reason why a High Plains textile industry, utilizing High Plains cotton, can't do the same for our cotton markets."

In support of his expectations, Anderson cites a recent report from the U. S. Department of Agriculture and two national consultant firms showing that the High Plains has all the ingredients for a successful open end spinning industry, including market opportunities, labor, water and other utilities.

1973-74 Officers For Barton-Hood Post

It was also revealed at the press conference that TIGOT is the group which holds U. S. rights to a "zero twist" yarn forming system and has contracted with the Texas Tech Textile Research Center for research work on that process. Nijverdal-Ten Cate is one of the Netherlands Consortium Companies which developed the zero twist method and from which TIGOT acquired U. S. rights about a year ago.

TIGOT has ordered six units of this new "machine", which bonds parallel fibers together with a water soluble bonding agent instead of twisting, for Tech's use in research. These six units are scheduled for delivery to Tech in September of this year.

Officials of both GOT and Nijverdal-Ten Cate agree that the potential for efficient utilization of short, low micronaire fibers on the zero twist system at this stage looks even better than on the open end system. They emphasize however that zero twist yarn forming is yet to be perfected for commercial use, and that its use by FFI in the future will have to be considered in the light of research results yet to be obtained.

In addition to Anderson and Cook, TIGOT officers include Joe Thompson, Vice President, of Abertnathy, and Donald Johnson of Lubbock, Secretary/Treasurer. Other members of the group are Roy Furr, Solon Clements, Dan Davis, Mrs. Howard Alford and Cotton Fanning, all of Lubbock, Ray Joe Riley of Hart, Donnell Echols of Lamesa and Don Marble of South Plains.

Joe Thompson, president of Southwest Textiles, Inc., of Abertnathy and a member of the Lubbock-based TIGOT, reported to The Review that his firm has contracted to purchase two frames for the revolutionary spinning process from a Czechoslovakian firm by Dec. 1, 1973. A third frame also is planned for the Abertnathy plant.
